CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FORTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

low tariffs. Its inducements are such as appertain to a new and unexhausted country, and to free institutions, which invite the lowest forms of humanity to tread the highway to wealth and honor on equal terms with every other American citizen. This is the star which shines on the oppressed and overworked of other lands, awakens them to aspirations for independence and social advancement, and charms them from the old homestead, the ancestral burial-ground, the national anthems, and the native tongue.

The great curse of American labor is sounded from the camps of its pseudo friends. The protective system has resulted in vast accumulations of capital in the hands of a few manufacturers. These by shutting out foreign goods keep control of the home market. If by miscalculation there is an overproduction, they meet together and agree to reduce it. The mills are closed or run on short time to accomplish it. The laborer is then totally idle or partially employed. Small pay and short rations to him compensate for the mistakes of the mill-owners. In such a strait England carries her surplus goods over the world, while our countrymen can not sell beyond their own borders because the protective system makes theirs too high to be sold elsewhere. While on this labor question I beg leave to call attention to a letter from Mr. W. H. Young, of Columbus, Ga. I premise by saying he has more knowledge on the subject of which he writes than any man in that State, and his high character is universally recognized. It reads thus:

COLUMBUS, GA., March 13, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I have your letter of 10th instant, in which you ask my views as to what effect a reduction of 20 per cent. would have on the cotton manufacturing interests of the South. To the question I answer unhesitatingly, none.

The South is now engaged in manufacturing, say, standard (or heavy weight) goods, and which are mainly consumed by the masses of our population South and North; and now the South sends her surplus productions to the North, where they displace all such heavy-weight goods as were formerly made there and sent South. These advantages (in all such goods) must ever remain with the South, over New England and Old England; and New England, on account of closer proximity to the cotton-fields, has a relative advantage over Old England.

A reduction of 20 per cent. in the tariff would not enable England to compete with this country, North or South, in these heavy-weight goods; but if the tariff on all articles entering into the cost of manufacturing in this country were also reduced 20 per cent., then the manufacturers North and South would be benefited; and if the duties on all such goods (entering into the cost of manufacturing) were made free, then the North and South could compete with England in all markets of the world. The tariff as it now stands of course shuts out all foreign competition with manufacturing productions in this country (except a few specialties of fine goods for the wealthy), and it locks in their productions, and thus confines them to the home demand, and as a consequence there is now a glut of goods. To illustrate my position: The company over which I preside consumes about fifty bales of cotton per day. A New England mill consuming that amount of cotton would have to pay $350 per day more for it than it costs this company, and a mill in England would have to pay more than that.

These advantages are so great that the tariff (if entirely removed) would not enable England to compete with this country on heavy-weight goods, and if the tariff was removed on all articles that enter into the cost of manufacturing, then this country could command the markets of the world and the supremacy of England would be ended.

I have visited England three times and have investigated the cost of labor compared with the South and found it more (or higher) than here, and yet our operatives were in better condition from the fact that food costs less with us and clothing, also, as our climate does not require such heavy clothing.

I think labor at the North about the same as in England.

I also investigated the cost and selling price of heavy cotton goods and concluded I could sell in England at a profit, but to do so I must adopt their peculiarities of styles, and I prefer a home market.

I believe if all our custom-houses were abolished that this country would find (in England) a large market for our manufactures of cotton and woolen goods. Now, this country is heavily taxed with almost everything that enters into the cost of production, beginning with machinery and ending with the baling the goods with Scotch burlaps.

I believe the manufacturing interests in this country, with their natural advantages, if free from all tariff legislation, would soon become the great manufacturing center.

Yours, truly,

EAGLE AND PHENIX MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
W. H. YOUNG, President.

Hon. HUGH BUCHANAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

This gentleman's life has been spent and his ambition has been directed to the advancement of manufacturing in Georgia. His statements can have no bias for free trade unless as he may accept it as a business man. It has this merit, that no favor is asked at the hands of the Government.

A careful estimate of the reduction of taxation under this bill by its friends does not show it to be more than $30,000,000.

This opens the way for the reduction of the tax on distilled fruits to 10 cents a gallon—a mere nominal sum to avoid fraud. It encourages farmers to put in brandy that which by decay would otherwise be lost.

We may take the entire tax off tobacco in every form. These two items now yield near twenty-three millions of revenue. If by these measures taxes are reduced $53,000,000, their enactment into law will place Congress in harmony with the popular demand. Let this be done. It has been sanctioned by the Democratic caucus. Obstruct it by denouncing the tax on whisky to increase the tariff, and the people will say you tax us on everything we use to enrich manufacturers, and think you can beguile us into acquiescence by a cry for free whisky. We know all taxation is onerous, but when we have to choose between two forms of it you had better quickly learn we are not stupid beasts.

I have seen it charged recently that the class of men who favored a tariff for revenue were for free trade and direct taxation. Paragraph 4 of section 9 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States is in these words:

No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken.

Such a mode of taxing the people, not by wealth but by numbers, would fall most easily on New England and most onerously on the South and West. It is so palpably unequal that no party in this country has ever adopted it or ever will. This charge is to avoid the truth in considering the enormities of the tariff by directing the people to an imaginary danger, or it comes from men of large wealth, who fear more tax on their incomes than tax on the land, the horse, the cow, or sheep of the farmer, and whose interest is not with them. As no man in my observance of public affairs in Congress has advocated such a policy it may be treated as the "idle wind."

There are among us those who do not like this bill and are constantly finding fault, who up to this good hour have never offered anything practical in the place of it. For this conduct I have no word of approval or sympathy. If my heart and head have been earnest to take off public burdens in the interest of fifty-five millions of freemen; if I have favored laws for the masses of the people; if I have resented the idea that large capitalists should manipulate the machinery of the Government to increase their wealth any longer, I have an abiding faith that my constituents will not meet me with sneers or withhold their approval of such conduct. For six years of financial depression I struggled to keep down expenditures and to avoid an increase of taxation. It is with heart-felt satisfaction I can now number myself with those who in the hour of my country's prosperity propose to the Congress of the United States to take off $53,000,000 of taxes.

I have said as much as I deem proper to do in the general debate. The discussion of details belongs to the consideration of the bill by paragraphs under the five-minute rule. I shall conform to this practice and conclude for the present.

During the remarks of Mr. BLOUNT the following took place:

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLOUNT. I object to any interruption.

Mr. EATON. Will not my friend answer one question?

Mr. BLOUNT. I object to interruptions; I have but one hour within which to present my views.

Mr. EATON. I want to ask you how long England has been a free-trade country; that is all.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think the gentleman knows, and everybody else around me knows.

Mr. EATON. I do not know whether you do or not.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman is discourteous enough to say that, he is quite welcome to it. I know I am stirring him up somewhat by these statements.

Mr. EATON. Not at all.

Mr. BLOUNT proceeded with his remarks, and at the expiration of the hour

The CHAIRMAN said: The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMMOND. I ask consent that the time of my colleague be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLOUNT resumed and concluded his remarks as above given.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. Chairman, I am at a loss to understand the logic of the advocates of free trade. Eight days ago certain gentlemen on the other side of the House, representing districts in the State of Ohio, voted for restoring the duties upon wools to what they were under the previous tariff. Yesterday we find them voting to take up this bill, which proposes to still further reduce the duties upon wools.

Gentlemen upon the other side, signally the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], stand forth as the champions of downtrodden Ireland. Yet I heard him the other day read a most eloquent speech intended to build up the industries and power of Great Britain, which is oppressing Ireland, by destroying our own industries. The other gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] tells us in season and out that his shibboleth is "free raw material." Yet we find him voting to take up this bill which still taxes raw material.

You gentlemen, all of you, say that the tariff makes a monopoly of manufacturing and mechanical industries. Yet in the next breath you say that trade is dull, that production has been overdone, that the American markets are glutted with goods, and prices are depressed because there are more goods to be sold than there are purchasers to buy. You say that you are in favor of the farmer, and yet you would strike down the customer that buys the wool from the millions of flock-owners in the United States. You say that you are in favor of the farmer, and yet you would destroy the greatest consumers of the farmer's cereal productions, the manufacturers and artisans of this country.

Finally, you say that you are in favor of the manufacturers. Yet you propose to sustain them as the Czar of Russia sustains his prisoners in Siberia, by keeping them at the starvation point. You say that the industries of the country are crippled. Yet we find that all the industries of this country, including both manufactures and agriculture, have grown faster and greater than those of any nation which we read of in history, and that under protection.

You tell us that we are cramped and crippled because we do not enjoy the blessings of free trade; that we should throw away our own market, which is a good one, in the vain quest of foreign markets now sadly overcrowded. Let us briefly consider that for a moment.

England has 40,000,000 of cotton spindles; this country has 12,000,000. Of the 40,000,000 of spindles in England at least 28,000,000 are running at a loss, 2,000,000 have stopped, and 8,000,000 of the remaining 10,000,000 may possibly be holding their own.

Of this balance a few of the newer mills are possibly turning a profit, although their markets, which are the markets of the world, are glutted and overburdened. This is no matter of fancy. Every trade report, every commercial paper, the dispatches of every day announce it. Depression exists all over the world unparalleled, vastly greater than with us. The metal industries of England are no better off. Scores of furnaces in Wales are blown out, waiting customers for their iron. The silk industries of England are disappearing; her linen industries are waning; her operatives are striking on every hand. She is suffering from great depression, much greater than exists in this country; yet she has free trade.

You ask us to abandon our markets to the competition of English pauper labor in exchange for markets already overcrowded, to compete in which our labor must be reduced to their level. I repeat, England has free trade, yet her greatest difficulty is to find a market for her manufactured products. The people of the United States can afford to and do consume three times as much per capita as the average of the nations of the world. The home market for both the farmer and manufacturer is now a good one. Open our ports to foreign goods and both would lose a good market in exchange for markets in which neither can compete with the wages of labor at their present rate.

You say that you are in favor of the American laborer, and yet you would strike him down to the level of the millions of European laborers who to-day are out of work and begging bread. This is the logic of the free-trade position. I append the following tables in regard to the relative prices of wages in this country and in Europe:

NOTE.—The various kinds of mechanics earn from two to three times as much in the United States as in England.

How will this bill affect the interests of the agriculturists of this country? Let us approach, in the first place, the question of the consumption of wool.

Great Britain, who is our chief competitor, consumes 335,000,000 pounds of wool per annum. This is probably washed pounds; the statistics do not say. The spinners of the United States consume 340,000,000 pounds. And upon the successful operation of these spindles depends the market of the American wool-grower. If the result of the enactment of this proposed bill be to affect injuriously the spinners of wool in this country, then you directly affect the growers of the wool. That the reduction of duties on woolens and worsteds by the tariff of 1883 has injuriously affected them, and consequently the wool-grower, will appear further on.

I will read in this connection an item from the Bradford Observer, a paper published in England in the district where worsted goods are more largely manufactured than at any other place in the world. The writer says:

In reference to America, our last review spoke of changes looming up in the distance.

A MEMBER. What is the date?

Mr. CHACE. This is the annual review of the Bradford trade for 1883. It came out early in this year, although it is not dated, except that it is the review of the business of the year 1883.

That sentence in reference to what was "looming up in the distance" meant that there was looming up in the distance a reduction of the tariff. But to return:

Our last review spoke of changes looming up in the distance—changes which would disorganize somewhat her trade [the American trade], and cause her to import much more largely from our district than under the old tariff. These changes came suddenly—somewhat earlier than we expected; for the new tariff bill, passed on the 4th of January, began to take effect on the 1st of July. The consequent changes have operated as we then indicated; and a much larger volume of trade is the result.

Further changes in the same direction may possibly again be made; but, for the sake of the industry of America as well as our own, we do not wish too rapid a return from the folly of protective tariffs in that great country.

Gentlemen, they are more cautious for us than you are.

I will follow that up by reading consular reports showing the increased exportation from the Bradford district to this country, commencing with the month of July, 1883. The increase in that month over the corresponding month of the preceding year was in round numbers, converting pounds into dollars, at $5 per pound, $50,000; in August, $320,000; in September, $132,000; in October, $625,000; in November, $400,000; in December, $305,000; in January, 1884, $365,000; in February, $310,000; and in March, $315,000. What does that mean? It means the destruction to that extent of the market of the 1,000,000 wool-growers, your farmer friends, in America.

I will read further from a letter which I have here from one of the largest wool commission merchants in this country:

A manufacturer who paid us 55 cents per pound in March, 1883, for medium combing wool to spin into medium worsted yarn, which he could then spin at a profit, now declines to give us over 43½ cents per pound, because he is importing the yarn from Germany already made, and is spooling and selling it to his customers at a larger profit than to make it of the same wool, costing 43 cents to-day for such as he bought of us a year ago at 55 cents. This same grade of yarn was made largely in Philadelphia a year ago, but the mills that were then making it have been compelled to find employment on other qualities. Therefore you will see how, while Congress intended to reduce the duty on wool only 3 cents per pound, by reducing the duty on goods manufactured of wool 16 cents per pound they have lowered the price of this grade of wool over 10 cents per pound, and it is hard to sell even at this figure. This is not a single instance, but it applies to the spinners of worsted yarns all over the country, and this instance only shows that if the increase of duties had passed under the Converse bill it would not have made a particle of difference to the price of wool so long as the duty upon goods made of wool remains as low as it is to-day.

I could go on and multiply these instances.

This bill strikes at the woolen industry, which is already heavily burdened. Reduce the duties upon woolen goods 20 per cent. more, and you will stop a very large proportion of the mills of this country. It is the opinion of many experts that the result would be a stoppage of one-half the mills; that it would be impossible for them to operate. If so, we can readily see what becomes of the market for the 300,000,000 pounds of American wool.

As to wheat, the agriculturist has already this foreign market to which you are pointing.

Mr. EATON. If the gentleman has the figures showing the annual value of the wool clip of the United States I wish he would incorporate them in his remarks. I think it is something like $100,000,000.

Mr. CHACE. The last clip of wool in this country is reported by Professor Dodge, statistician of the Agricultural Bureau, to be 300,000,000 pounds. He estimates the average price at 27 cents, making the gross value of the clip $81,000,000. Prominent wool merchants estimate it at 320,000,000 pounds, and $100,000,000 at tide water. No doubt Professor Dodge's estimate is the value on the farms.

In my judgment to-day the question of protection is a more important one to the agriculturists of the country even than it is to the manufacturing and mechanical interests. What would cripple the manufacturing and mechanical interests would be also most injurious to the agriculturist. And that this is no chimera, I desire to call the attention of the House to the changes which are going on in regard to the market for our cereal crops, especially wheat.

Our American farmers have been resting in fancied security, supposing they had their home markets sure and that they could sell against all comers in the foreign market. In both those respects I think I shall be able to show they are in some danger.

The great wheat fields of Russia are only waiting the development of the railroad systems in the east of Europe to enable the Russian farmer to get communication with Western Europe to compete successfully with the American farmer. South America, with her pampas, of fertility unparalleled on the surface of the globe, is now, under the stimulus of English aid, rapidly advancing in the production of wheat and maize. The ryots of India, who feed upon rice and millet-seed, with wages at 6 to 10 cents a day, under the care and tutelage of the East India Government are rapidly coming forward as competitors with our Western farmers. Australia is sending wheat largely to Europe. I read from an article by William Fowler, a member of the British Parliament, figures showing the export of wheat from India:

A few years ago no one thought much of Indian wheat as an article of commerce. The trade may be said to have commenced in 1873, when the export duty ceased. Great reductions in freight have recently occurred, and railways, however gradually, have approached some of the great wheat-growing districts. The progress of the trade has been truly astonishing. The figures are as follows:

Year.	Cwts.	Bushels.
Amount of Indian wheat exported—
1873	394,010	735,485⅓
1878	6,373,168	11,896,580⅝
1879	1,056,720	1,972,544
1880	2,201,515	4,109,494⅜
1881	7,444,375	13,896,166⅔
1882	19,901,005	37,148,542⅜
1883 (six months)	15,714,982	29,334,633⅜

This all goes to Europe.

In 1882 19,901,500 hundredweight, and for the first six months of the crop-year of 1883–'84 it was 15,714,982, with a fair prospect that the exportation of wheat from India during this crop-year will amount to 50,000,000 of bushels.

Our crop in 1883 was 420,000,000 of bushels, and we exported (reducing flour to bushels, five bushels to a barrel) 147,811,000 bushels. The exports of agricultural products of all kinds in 1881 of $730,394,943 has fallen off to $619,269,449 in 1883. The amount of wheat "in sight" in the United States to-day is 145 per cent. above what it was two years ago, while the exports so far for the present crop-year are only about one-half what they were last year for the same time.

Mr. HAMMOND. Why do you skip the year 1882 in your calculation?

Mr. CHACE. Because the year 1882 was very much less—very low indeed. It was only $552,000,000.

Mr. HAMMOND. I wanted to know what the fact was.

Mr. CHACE. Unfortunately the holders of and dealers in wheat had not found out they had great competitors in the East. Believing they controlled the foreign markets, they held their wheat at high prices, so high that they were beaten in the European markets. The result was our exportation was small. That points to the issue to which I am trying to call the attention of the House, that the only sure market the American farmer has is the home market which the American consumer makes for him. [Applause.] It appears by the census report all the persons employed in gainful occupations in this country are 17,392,099. Employed in agriculture, 7,620,493; employed in professional pursuits and personal service, 4,074,238; employed in trade and transportation, 1,810,256; employed in manufacturing, mechanical pursuits, and mining industries, 3,837,112.

In the list of persons employed in mechanical pursuits and mining industries none of those engaged in the administrative departments (so called) are enumerated. A large number of those employed in small mechanical industries are also left out; so that, from information obtained at the Census Office, it is entirely reasonable to conclude that 500,000 people who are directly employed in these various occupations are not included in the census enumeration as engaged in these occupations. That was the opinion of the Superintendent of the Census ten years ago, and is also the statement that is now made, and I have no doubt that the result is similar under the last census.

If you are successful in passing this bill it would fall far short of what appears to be your purpose, if you were to cripple the industries, at least 20 per cent. If, then, you throw out of these different employments 20 per cent. of the people engaged in them, of course you throw out 20 per cent. of those who are dependent upon them, amounting altogether to, say, 1,700,000. Therefore, of the 1,700,000 people thrown out of employment, allowing five members to a family, you have a total of 8,500,000 people who would be driven from their present occupations. These people will change from wage-earners in mechanical and manufacturing pursuits to what? They must seek a subsistence in the soil. There is no other resource open to them. The consumption of wheat is shown to be in this country about five bushels per capita. That would be taking out consumers of 42,000,000 bushels. If instead of consumers they become raisers of wheat, what is the result? The producers of wheat make sixty bushels per capita. If they then become producers of 100,000,000 bushels of wheat, that makes a difference in your market of about 100,000,000 bushels, besides the loss of the foreign market, which seems now probable.

Now to return to the question of Indian wheat. The report of the department of India shows that the cost of raising wheat in India is 35 cents a bushel. At 35 cents a bushel, with the ruling rates of freight upon Indian railroads, they can lay their wheat down in the European market cheaper than it can be laid down from this country. The railroad rates in India are about double for the same distance what they are in this country. The Indian government finds that the reduction in rates has already made an increase in earnings on their railroads. Lower prices give them increased traffic, and they are looking toward further reductions.

There are 20,000,000 acres in wheat now in India, and 55,000,000 more which may be converted to wheat-culture without encroaching upon other crops, making about double the present wheat acreage of the United States, the production per acre being about the same in India as here, twelve bushels. The soil of India is very fertile, and they have an agricultural population of 200,000,000.

The present rate of expenses are reported to be:

	Cents.
Inland freight, average (about)	16
Commission, inland	5
Bags and port expenses	8
Ocean freights, from 25 to	30
Insurance and London charges	5
Average (say)	64
Cost to raise wheat	35
Total	99

When these heavy expenses are reduced, as they can be, the competition will be very strong. They will continue until you find Indian farmers beating you in prices in the European markets. Should that be the case, does it not behoove the American farmer to retain and build up his American market? Who is the friend of the American farmer; you free-traders, who would build up a foreign monopoly of manufacturers, or he who would build up the business upon our own soil?

Below are the totals given in a table, prepared by the Bureau of Statistics, showing the amounts of dutiable agricultural products imported into this country during the years 1882 and 1883 and the rate and amount of duties collected on them. Among them are $4,000,000 worth of live animals, $12,667,000 worth of breadstuffs and farinaceous foods, $18,000,000 worth of fruit, nearly $1,000,000 worth of hay, more than $1,000,000 worth of potatoes, and $1,800,000 worth of provisions, including $939,000 worth of butter. Included in the item of breadstuffs is $1,893,406 worth of rice, the duty upon which is a direct protection to the Southern farmer. East Indian rice is worth in bond in New York from 2¼ cents to 2¾ cents per pound wholesale, the duty being 2½ cents per pound and the average ad valorem rate last year being 114.8 per cent. The average duty on fruits was 25.35 per cent.; on sugar and molasses 52.88 per cent., and 31.17 per cent. of all the duties collected was on agricultural articles. A favorite method of figuring with the free-trade doctrinaires is to assume that if an article is imported on which there is a duty that fact is proof that all such articles produced and consumed in this country are enhanced by so much. I annex a table, prepared by the Agricultural Bureau, showing that the gross agricultural products of this country in 1882 amounted to $3,600,000,000; the average duties being 31 per cent., would amount to $1,116,000,000; either an utter absurdity or we are paying our farmers a great bonus. It is pure nonsense. The fact is the foreigner generally pays the whole or a part of the duty on all articles.

The meat products amount to at least $800,000,000, the dairy products $400,000,000, orchard products exceed $150,000,000, wool at least $80,000,000, besides garden products, cane and other sugars, sirups, rice, and minor products, which foot up an aggregate approximating $4,000,000,000, of which about $400,000,000 should be deducted for the cereals, mostly corn, duplicated in the meat, making a net production of $3,600,000,000. Pasturage is not mentioned.

J. R. DODGE, Statistician.

You say that the tariff increases the prices of goods. I hold that most of the goods which the farmer buys are quality for quality as cheap as he could buy them in Europe. Two years ago when I addressed the House on this subject I inserted in my remarks a table of comparative prices existing then, which I will revise and reissue at this time. You buy calico prints made in this country cheaper than in Manchester. The print cloth which sold last week in Manchester at 3½ cents sold in this country at 3⅝.

Tickings, denims, stripes, osnaburgs, heavy shirtings, and fine bleached shirtings are all sold in this country; sold, unhappily, without profit to the manufacturer, but are sold as cheap, quality for quality, as they are bought in England. I do not speak now of the finer goods, but the ordinary grades of goods such as the mass of the people wear.

Mr. EATON. Is the gentleman not aware of this fact, that the cotton trade in Great Britain pirate the trade-marks of the Wamsutta and other mills of Massachusetts and Connecticut to sell their own goods?

Mr. CHACE. Oh, yes; they do that everywhere; they do it in China and India.

Mr. BLAND. You do not need much protection, then, on that class of goods.

Mr. CHACE. That is a pertinent remark the gentleman from Missouri makes. Who comes here to complain of the duty on cotton goods? The friends of the American system told you forty years ago, "Protect these infant industries and we will build them up, and home competition will bring the price down, and you will get them as cheap as you are now buying them abroad." We tell you to-day, "Give us protection on fine cotton goods, and we will perform the same feat and redeem the promise, as we have long since done on the coarser goods."

Mr. HAMMOND. In the next forty years?

Mr. BLAND. I wish to suggest to the gentleman that we need no protection on the articles he mentions wherein we compete with foreign countries. And I ask the gentleman how long have they been protected? How long has the infant been growing to manhood?

Mr. CHACE. That infant has been a man for a great many years, let me tell the gentleman. The difficulty is gentlemen do not understand this thing. The gentleman from Missouri does not understand it.

Mr. BLAND. I am inquiring for information.

Mr. CHACE. You start out on a wrong theory. We have heard speakers over and over again proceed in this way. Duties are added to the foreign prices. The value of the goods is so many millions of dollars. Add the duties and that amounts to I do not know how much—hundreds of thousands of millions—more money than all there is in the world. It is an absurd and rediculous fallacy. The farmer buys all his agricultural implements in this country better and cheaper than he can buy them abroad. There is a long list of articles besides that are sold nearly as cheap as they are abroad: Epsom salts, glauber salts, sulphate of soda, copperas, cod-liver oil, bromide of potash, iodide of potash, sulphate of ammonia, stoves and all culinary implements except tinware; shovels, spades, and axes; all carpenters' and machinists' tools; common hardware; boots, shoes, and sole leather; carriages, carts, harness; clocks, watches, sewing-machines; cheap paper-hangings, picture-frames, many kinds of buttons.

An ordinary suit of woolen clothing is bought nearly as cheap as anywhere in the world. Home competition has brought these goods down until they are sold at almost no profit. Hence there is no monopoly here. Before these industries were built up by protection every one of these articles was sold here at very much higher prices. Some of them at three or four times their present price. Their manufacture could not have been established but for protection. Foreigners would be glad to sell their goods at a loss temporarily in our markets in order to destroy our industries, when prices would immediately advance. Give us sufficient protection on the finer goods and in a few years we shall be emancipated from foreign domination on them also.

But to return. This is a contest between two distinct forms of civilization; one exemplified by Great Britain, with her laws, her social and fiscal systems contrived to build up the few and keep them so, to depress the many and prevent them from rising; the other illustrated by our own broad, free country, with 55,000,000 of healthy, improving, prosperous people, with abundant means for moral, social, and intellectual improvement, where the paths to wealth, to social and political honor and position are wide open and free to the humblest in the land—the membership of this House well illustrates that—a system based upon the principle of building up men first and wealth afterward, of producing the best in abundance but not at the cost of humanity; a system which while it may bring temporarily higher cost of some articles brings at the same time to the laborer relatively more means to buy with. In Great Britain everything is bent toward cheap production. Her metals and textile fabrics crowd the world's markets, but at the cost of her ill-paid and suffering people. This contest involves not the safety of the rich man's hoard so much as it does the maintenance of the prosperity, the comfort, the moral, social, and intellectual elevation of the millions in this country who live by labor, and also the open door of relief for suffering millions across the ocean.

In order that we may appreciate it I desire to read a few extracts from some English sources as to the conditions in Great Britain. The United Kingdom contains 120,000 square miles of territory, or seventy-seven and a half millions of acres, excluding water, with a population of 35,000,000 in round numbers. Of the seventy-seven and a half millions of acres of land, 16,000,000 are used for parks or are waste, while fifteen and a half millions are absolutely waste. England itself contains about 58,000 square miles, about as much as Pennsylvania and Maryland, with a population of 445 to the square mile. But after deducting the waste and barren lands and gentlemen's parks, the proportion to the square mile is nearly double that. Belgium has 485 people to the square mile. The United States has but 18.

Of the 52,000,000 acres in Great Britain 25 owners hold 5,000,000 acres; 1,454 owners hold 24,000,000 acres, or nearly one-half; 2,238 owners hold 39,000,000 acres, or nearly four-fifths; 47,000 owners hold nine-tenths of the whole acreage; and all the land in England and Wales outside of the metropolis is owned by 972,836 holders, and 1,173,000 in the whole kingdom—thus leaving some 26,000,000 as mere tenants. The following are a few of the great estates, as collated by Bateman from the Domesday Book. I introduce them as a mere matter of interest:

	Acres.
Sir Thomas Dyke Ackland, Bart	36,586
Marquis of Aylesbury	55,051
Earl of Lonsdale	67,950
Duke of Rutland	70,039
Duke of Bedford	87,507
Sir Watkins Williams Wynn (Wales)	91,032
Duke of Devonshire	148,629
Duke of Northumberland	191,480
Total	748,274

These lands yield an average income of about £1 per annum per acre, or for the eight men say $3,460,295 per annum from their lands; nearly 750,000 acres in the hands of eight men in a land the most crowded of any civilized country in the world.

Their whole system is contrived to continue this state of things. The law of primogeniture, the system of jointures, dower, and entail tie up the land for generation after generation. It is estimated that there are no more land-holders now in Great Britain than there were at the time William the Conquerer committed the greatest larceny in history—when he stole all the land in England and divided it among his retainers. Probably there are more people in the State of Massachusetts who own their homes than there are in all England who own theirs. The suffrage, the land laws, and the systems of taxation in Great Britain are most ingeniously contrived to prevent the people from rising. In no country in the world is property so unequally divided. In no country in the world are the few so very rich, the many so very poor, with no hope but to grind the hard wheel of fate until death brings relief.

The bill of rights forbids a standing army in England in times of peace; but England has a standing army of 922,000 paupers. In the whole kingdom there are a round million of paupers. In the United States there are 67,000 paupers. These are paupers in almshouses, not people who receive outdoor aid; because in a hard season there have been 500,000 people in the city of London alone who have received outdoor aid. The misery, starvation, disease, crime, and degradation of East London to-day is something appalling. If you would feast upon horrors, read the bitter cry of "Outcast London," a little pamphlet which was published last fall by the Congregational Union in London. I will read a few words from it. Before I do so I will ask, Mr. Chairman, how much time I have left?

The CHAIRMAN [Mr. SPRINGER]. The gentleman has fifteen minutes of his time remaining.

Several MEMBERS. Go on; you can have all the time you want.

Mr. CHACE. Very well; if the House will bear with me, then I will read a little more copiously than I would otherwise do. Observe this is British authority. I read from a pamphlet published in London. Speaking of these people it says:

> Two cautions if is important to bear in mind. First, the information given does not refer to select cases. It simply reveals a state of things which is found in house after house, court after court, street after street. Secondly, there has been absolutely no exaggeration. It is a plain recital of plain facts. Indeed, no respectable printer would print, and certainly no decent family would admit even the driest statement of the horrors and infamies discovered in one brief visitation from house to house. So far from making the worst of our facts for the purpose of appealing to emotion, we have been compelled to tone down everything, and wholly to omit what most needs to be known, or the ears and eyes of our readers would have been insufferably outraged.
> THE CONDITION IN WHICH THEY LIVE.
> We do not say the condition of their homes, for how can those places be called homes, compared with which the lair of a wild beast would be a comfortable and healthy spot? Few who will read these pages have any conception of what these pestilential human rookeries are, where tens of thousands are crowded together amidst horrors which call to mind what we have heard of the middle passage of the slave-ship. To get into them you have to penetrate courts reeking with poisonous and malodorous gases arising from accumulations of sewage and refuse scattered in all directions and often flowing beneath your feet; courts, many of them which the sun never penetrates, which are never visited by a breath of fresh air, and which rarely know the virtues of a drop of cleansing water. You have to ascend rotten staircases, which threaten to give way beneath every step, and which, in some places, have already broken down, leaving gaps that imperil the limbs and lives of the unwary. You have to grope your way along dark and filthy passages swarming with vermin. Then, if you are not driven back by the intolerable stench, you may gain admittance to the dens in which these thousands of beings who belong, as much as you, to the race for whom Christ died, herd together. Have you pitied the poor creatures who sleep under railway arches, in carts or casks, or under any shelter which they can find in the open air? You will see that they are to be envied in comparison with those whose lot it is to seek refuge here. Eight feet square—that is about the average size of very many of these rooms.
> Every room in these rotten and reeking tenement-houses a family, often two. In one cellar a sanitary inspector reports finding a father, mother, three children, and four pigs! In another room a missionary found a man ill with small-pox, his wife just recovering from her eighth confinement, and the children running about half-naked and covered with dirt. Here are seven people living in one underground kitchen, and a little dead child lying in the same room. Elsewhere is a poor widow, her three children, and a child who had been dead thirteen days. Her husband, who was a cabman, had shortly before committed suicide. Here lives a widow and her six children, including one daughter of 29, another of 21, and a son of 27. Another apartment contains father, mother, and six children, two of whem are ill with scarlet fever. In another, nine brothers and sisters, from 29 years of age downwards, live, eat, and sleep together. Here is a mother who turns her children into the street in the early evening because she lets her room for immoral purposes until long after midnight, when the poor little wretches creep back again if they have not found some miserable shelter elsewhere. Where there are beds they are simply heaps of dirty rags, shavings, or straw, but for the most part these miserable beings find rest only upon the filthy boards. The tenant of this room is a widow, who herself occupies the only bed, and lets the floor to a married couple for 2*s.* 6*d.* per week. In many cases matters are made worse by the unhealthy occupations followed by those who dwell in these habitations. Here you are choked as you enter by the air laden with particles of the superfluous fur pulled from the skins of rabbits, rats, dogs, and other animals in their preparation for the furrier. Here the smell of paste or of drying match-boxes, mingling with other sickly odors, overpowers you; or it may be the fragrance of stale fish or vegetables, not sold on the previous day, and kept in the room overnight. Even when it is possible to do so the people seldom open their windows, but if they did it is questionable whether much would be gained, for the external is scarcely less heavily charged with poison than the atmosphere within.

POVERTY.

The poverty, we mean of those who try to live honestly; for notwithstanding the sickening revelations of immorality which have been disclosed to us, those who endeavor to earn their bread by honest work far outnumber the dishonest. And it is to their infinite credit that it should be so, considering that they are daily face to face with the contrast between their wretched earnings and those which are the produce of sin. A child 7 years old is known easily to make 10*s.* 6*d.* a week by thieving, but what can he earn by such work as match-box making, for which 2½*d.* a gross is paid, the maker having to find his own fire for drying the boxes and his own paste and string? Before he can gain as much as the young thief he must make 56 gross of match-boxes a week, or 1,296 a day. It is needless to say that this is impossible, for even adults can rarely make more than an average of half that number. How long, then, must the little hands toil before they can earn the price of the scantiest meal. Women, for the work of trousers' finishing (i. e., sewing in linings, making button-holes, and stitching on the buttons), receive 2½*d.* a pair, and have to find their own thread.

Think of it; 5 cents a pair. My friend from Boston [Mr. MORSE] knows how much that is. I do not know how much he pays.

Mr. MORSE. Fully as much as that.

Mr. CHACE. I have no doubt he does. I would be willing to be interrupted to have him state to us how much he does pay.

We ask a woman who is making tweed trousers, how much she can earn in a day, and are told one shilling. But what does a day mean to this poor soul? Seventeen hours! From five in the morning to ten at night—no pause for meals. She eats her crust and drinks a little tea as she works, making in very truth with her needle and thread not her living only, but her shroud. For making men's shirts these women are paid 10*d.* a dozen; lawn-tennis aprons, 3*d.* a dozen; and babies' hoods, from 1*s.* 6*d.* to 2*s.* 6*d.* a dozen. In St. George's-in-the-East large numbers of women and children, some of the latter only seven years old, are employed in sack-making, for which they get a farthing each. In one house was found a widow and her half-idiot daughter making paillasses at 1½*d.* each. Here is a woman who has a sick husband and a little child to look after. She is employed at shirt-finishing at 3*d.* a dozen, and by the utmost effort can only earn 6*d.* a day, out of which she has to find her own thread. Another, with a crippled hand, maintains herself and a blind husband by match-box making, for which she is remunerated on the liberal scale mentioned above; and out of her 2½*d.* a gross she has to pay a girl a penny a gross to help her. Others obtain at Covent Garden in the season 1*d.* or 2*d.* a peck for shelling peas, or 6*d.* a basket for walnuts; and they do well if their labor brings them 10*d.* or a shilling a day. With men it is comparatively speaking no better.

"My master," says one man visited by a recent writer in the Fortnightly Review, "gets a pound for what he gives me 3*s.* for making." And this it is easy to believe, when we know that for a pair of fishing boots which will be sold at three guineas the poor workman receives 5*s.* 3*d.* if they are made to order, or 4*s.* 6*d.* if made for stock. An old tailor and his wife are employed in making policemen's overcoats. They have to make, finish, hot-press, put on the buttons, and find their own thread, and for all this they receive 2*s.* 10*d.* for each coat. This old couple work from half past 6 in the morning until 10 at night, and between them can just manage to make a coat in two days. Here is a mother who has taken away whatever articles of clothing she can strip from her four little children without leaving them absolutely naked. She has pawned them not for drink, but for coals and food. A shilling is all she can procure, and with this she has bought seven pounds of coals and a loaf of bread. We might fill page after page with these dreary details, but they would become sadly monotonous, for it is the same everywhere.

Professor Huxley says that in his voyage around the world and in all his studies of savage life he found no people so miserable, wretched, and degraded as those who exist in the poorer quarters of London.

Thousands of families have only a single room to live in. It is difficult to exaggerate the misery which such conditions of life must cause or the impulses which they must give to vice. Three schools were taken and the condition of the children was ascertained. They came from 1,129 families. Of these 871 families had only one room to live in. In a majority of these cases the families living in one room contained five or more persons; in some cases as many as nine.

In the Dublin Freeman's Journal the following advertisement appears:

WANTED—Strong, humble girl to assist in minding children and go of messages; age, 15; 8 shillings per quarter. Apply at 59 Harcourt street, 11 o'clock to 2, Monday.

For minding the children and running on errands the "strong, humble girl" will receive $8 per year, or 67 cents a month. Happy land!

The Glasgow Herald last month stated that there are in the city of Glasgow 45,000 families each living in a single room. These are among the worst of the pictures in Great Britain.

But there are millions upon millions of people employed in her industrial pursuits who fare but little better. In Manchester, in Oldham, in Birmingham, in Bradford, where these worsted goods are made to which I have referred, if a man (or woman) leaves his work or loses his place, hundreds are ready to step in. The wages they earn are but barely sufficient to support life. Their flagging energies are kept up by constant draughts of beer. There is but one great river in England, and that is not laid down in the map. It is a river of beer, running down the throats of her people, in which they drown their sorrows.

The London Times says of the agricultural laborer in England: "His condition is hopeless; once a peasant always a peasant."

Joseph Arch said: "The agricultural laborers of England look with envy upon the beasts of burden."

Gladstone, in his indictment of D'Israeli, says:

We have now nauseated the world with the doctrine that British interests supply the final criterion of right and wrong.

This is the condition to which you free-traders would bring American labor. These are the competitors to whom you would force us to yoke ourselves in an unequal contest.

England has cunningly contrived her system. England, who preaches free trade to us, having fortified herself in her position, her industrial history dating back eight hundred years while ours is but a hundred years old, having bound her labor hand and foot without any hope to rise, asks us, and you gentlemen would aid her, to throw open our ports in order that she may dump her cheap-made wares upon us and destroy our industries. She wrings her taxes largely from the laborer.

See what the English Financial Reform Almanac says. After reciting the means by which England raises the money to support her government, it says:

Let the reader study this fearful table, and see how the earnings of the working class, wrung from taxation on their food and drink, are flung away wholesale.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SPRINGER). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that the gentleman's time be extended. That privilege has been accorded every other speaker.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] asks consent that the time of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] may be extended.

Mr. WELLBORN. What length of time does the gentleman want?

Mr. CHACE. I should think I might get through in twenty minutes.

Mr. COBB. We will give you twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

Mr. DEUSTER. I object. There are at least one hundred names on the list of those who desire to speak on this question.

Mr. REED. And the longer each one speaks the fewer there will be to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is not debatable. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] have time to conclude his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHACE. Great Britain raised in 1882 from her land-tax $5,130,998.19.

Mr. DEUSTER. Mr. Chairman, I objected to the extension of the gentleman's time and did not withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island will suspend. The Chair was under the impression that no one objected to extending his time. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DEUSTER] now interrupts the gentleman from Rhode Island to say that he objected and did not withdraw his objection.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island has occupied one hour and two minutes.

Mr. DEUSTER. I object, because there are so many others who want to speak.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I think it is too late now to raise the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman objected in time, but the Chair supposed he had withdrawn the objection.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. But when the question was submitted to the Committee of the Whole——

Mr. REED. When the gentleman from Rhode Island was reading he suggested that he might not have time to read all he desired, and everybody about him said that he should have an extension of his time. Thereupon he was induced to read some things which otherwise he would not have read. I suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin whether under these circumstances he will insist on his objection.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Rhode Island will state what time he desires perhaps there will be no objection.

Mr. CHACE. I will try to get through in fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman to proceed for fifteen minutes?

Mr. DEUSTER. I do not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman from Rhode Island will proceed.

Mr. CHACE. I was saying the amount which the British Government raised in 1882 from its land-tax was $5,130,998.19. When I state that the city of Philadelphia last year raised more than nine and a half million dollars by taxation upon real estate you will appreciate the comparative difference. There has been no revaluation of land for the purpose of taxation in Great Britain since 1690, and by a strange system of redemptions established in the time of Pitt's administration, holders of real estate were enabled to buy exemption from taxation at a very small price; thus they have reduced their land-tax to a mere trifle. The money that supports the Government of Great Britain is wrung largely from the hard earnings of the laborer and from the tolls that she puts upon the commerce of the world.

The following table exhibits the sources from which the revenue of the British Government was derived in 1882, reducing pounds sterling to dollars at $4.8665:

Land-tax	£1,051,433 =	$5,130,998 19
Income-tax	10,004,904 =	48,688,865 31
House duty	1,698,192 =	8,264,251 37
Excise	27,240,000 =	132,563,460 00
Stamps	12,260,000 =	59,663,290 00
Customs	19,280,000 =	93,826,120 00
Post-office	7,000,000 =	34,065,500 00
Telegraph	1,630,000 =	7,932,395 00
Crown lands	380,000 =	1,849,270 00
Interest on advance to corporation works	1,020,433 =	4,965,937 19
Suez Canal shares	198,829 =	977,701 33
Miscellaneous	4,136,019 =	20,127,936 46
Total	85,899,810 =	418,055,724 85

I wish to call attention to of the disabilities under which the manufacturers of this country labor as compared with those of Great Britain.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman omitted to speak about the income-tax in Great Britain, a tax which we have not now in this country. Does that tax come out of the poor?

Mr. CHACE. I include that in my list; but I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me, because I want to get along as fast as I can.

But you ask how can such a nation pay such an amount of excise, house-tax, stamps, and, finally, of income-tax? The reply is, the house tax and the excise is wrung largely from the laboring class. The others can be afforded, because England has cunningly contrived to make nearly all the world pay commercial tribute to her. Her whole system is adjusted to throw the expense of her government either upon foreigners or upon the labor of her country. Let us compare the tax on a 50,000-spindle cotton-mill in Bolton, England, with that of a similar one in Fall River, Mass. Consul Shaw gives the tax on a 72,000-spindle mill at Bolton, in 1878: District and poor rates, $1,800; government taxes, $200; total, $2,000. At that rate the tax on a 50,000-spindle mill would be $1,389.

The mill in England pays no other tax except the income-tax of the stockholders. This year probably neither will make any profit, so the above is all the tax that would be put upon the business in Bolton. In Fall River a 50,000-spindle mill would be assessed at $750,000. At a rate of about 1½ per cent., which is lower than the average, the tax would be $11,250; a difference of $9,861. Having handicapped the rest of the world with a century the start, she says to all the nations, "Now come trade with us on equal terms." They have subsidized steamers and opened mail facilities to every part of the globe, with the result that London is the banking center of the world. She gets a brokerage or a commissiom on a very large share of the freight of the world. She borrows at 3 per cent. and lends at usurious rates to every nation. Her industrial power, the result of the accumulation of machinery, tools, and steam-power, is immense.

It has been estimated that the steam-power of Great Britain is equivalent to the individual effort of 450,000,000 of men. The productive power of her machinery probably far exceeds that. With all these advantages it is hopeless for us to attempt to compete with her while we maintain our present system. It is to put our labor, well-housed, well-paid, well-clothed and fed, with all the comforts and many of the luxuries of life, against that which I have portrayed; to match capital, now earning good returns, with theirs seeking investments all over the world; to compete with them and pay our own taxes, while they saddle theirs on the trade of one-third of the population of the earth.

It ought not to be necessary at this day to reason with an American audience upon the question of guarding our own industries. Since the Southern States have abandoned the idea of maintaining the feudal system, no considerable portion of our people can have any interest in destroying our industries. Alexander Hamilton says:

All history clearly shows that while the necessities of nations exclusively devoted to agriculture for the fabrics of manufacturing States are constant and regular, the wants of the latter for the products of the former are liable to very considerable fluctuation and interruption.

Further he says:

Previous to the Revolution the quantity of coin possessed by the Colonies which now compose the United States appeared to be inadequate, and their debt to Great Britain was progressing. Since the Revolution the States in which manufactures have most increased have recovered faster from the injuries of the late war and abound most in pecuniary resources.—Alexander Hamilton's Report on Manufactures, page 336 of his works.

I commend my Southern brethren to compare the results in their own part of the land. With natural resources far greater than ours in the North and East, they have until lately pursued the agricultural policy alone. We have diversified the manufacturing with agriculture. There is room enough for all. Why do you not enter the race and join hands with us in saving to ourselves our own markets, and by so doing build up yourselves, that so we may build each other up?

In 1845 Dr. Wayland published his work on political economy. I believe him to have been a thoroughly honest man. He believed every word he wrote. On page 150 of the last edition of his work he used the following language:

We pay a heavy duty on cutlery in this country, while not a hundredth part of the cutlery used is made here. It would be one hundred times cheaper to pay a bounty equal to the present duty on cutlery, and it would be, for all I can see, just as good for the cutler. The whole effect of this mode of encouragement is to pay one man as much more as the bounty amounts to for producing the article than we should pay another man, &c.

When the old man wrote that he thought he had concluded the whole argument. No doubt that statement has convinced many students in our colleges who have studied Dr. Wayland's work. It appeared to be a demonstration absolute. But if Dr. Wayland could come back now he would blush to see how different the logic of events is from his logic; for we are undoubtedly fully one hundred times better off as we are. Including in the schedule knives, edge-tools, and saws, I find that in the year ending June 1, 1882, we imported $1,999,388 worth. But we have now 663 shops, employing 16,236 hands, with a capital of $17,525,129, which produce $19,841,043 worth of those articles, and we export $1,172,256 worth. The exports amount to 6 per cent. of the production, while of our boasted agricultural products we exported in 1882 only about 7½ per cent., excluding cotton. The American to-day buys his cutlery as cheap and a better article than the citizen of England, and is indebted to this very protection for it.

Herewith is a table of the prices of some of the leading articles of hardware at retail here and in England at the same time last year:

Wholesale English and American prices, in 1882, of staple articles of hardware.

[Obtained by personal inquiry, for the American Iron and Steel Association, from an English hardware merchant and from a prominent Philadelphia merchant.

I wish especially to call attention of my friend from Kentucky [Mr. TURNER], who is so deeply interested in the subject of trace-chains. [Laughter.] The first prices are English and the next American for the same article, so you can compare them.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. The gentleman has called attention to me in reference to the subject of trace-chains, and I hope he will let me ask him a question.

Mr. CHACE. I have shown that you can buy trace-chains cheaper here than in England.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. If they are cheaper, then why do you want to have a tariff on them?

Mr. CHACE. If they are cheaper, why do you object to the duty?

Gentlemen on the other side are making various assertions as to the amount that labor constitutes of the whole cost of manufactured articles in this country, basing their statements upon the census reports. But they forget that the census does not pretend to give all the labor in these industries. The administrative labor, as it is called, is left out. It was so done on purpose. As a matter of comparison let us examine one or two articles. Pig-iron is one of the great articles of manufacture, and is commonly considered one of the cheapest.

We see it frequently asserted that the labor in the manufacture of a ton of pig-iron is somewhere about $4.35. Now, what are the facts? Iron is made up of ore, fuel, limestone, interest, and depreciation upon plant, taxes, insurance, supplies, labor, and transportation. Here is the cost of labor in one ton of pig-iron in one of the best furnaces in the State of Pennsylvania: There is used, to make a ton of pig-iron, on an average, about two tons of ore, which may fairly be estimated to be worth 50 cents per ton in the ground; one and one-half tons of coal, worth 32 cents in the ground; and a little flux, worth so little that its value in the ground can hardly be estimated.

Wages earned in mining enough ore for one ton of pig-iron	$5 18
Wages earned in mining enough limestone for same	33
Wages earned in mining enough anthracite for same	1 71
Wages earned in making enough coke for same	28
Wages earned in transporting above ore	56
Wages earned in transporting above limestone	06
Wages earned in transporting above anthracite	45
Wages earned in transporting above coke	22
Wages earned by furnace hands in making one ton pig-iron	2 75
Total wages earned in making one gross ton pig-iron	11 54

A ton of pig-iron is worth from $18 to $20.

But there are many forms of manufacture in which the cost of labor amounts to so nearly the total cost that the percentage of material is an item hardly worth consideration. As an illustration of this take watch springs and watch screws. One pound troy weight of steel wire of which watch screws are made is worth about 62 cents. Of this pound perhaps 20 per cent. is raw material. One pound would make 247,000 screws, which are worth at wholesale, as reported to me by the treasurer of a celebrated watch company, $1,715 a pound.

Let us carry this estimate on into a ton, and we shall then have some idea of the amount of labor that enters into some of the finer manufactures. One ton avoirdupois, 2,240 pounds, multiplied by 7,000, the number of grains in a pound avoirdupois, amounts to 15,680,000. This divided by 5,760, the number of grains in a pound troy, gives us 2,722 troy pounds in a ton. That multiplied by $1,715, the price at which a pound of screws sells at wholesale, makes a ton of these screws amount to $4,668,230. The raw material in this ton of screws costs from $2.75 to $3. Hair-springs, by the same method of calculation, amount to $3,135,744 per ton. Fine silver is $32,527.71 per ton and fine gold $602,928.51 in New York. Thus we see under the magic touch of the artisan's hand the baser metal becomes nearly eight times more precious than gold.

Scattered all over the country are thousands of men working upon various mechanical productions in which the relative value of the raw material, although rarely equal, in some cases approaches this, and in a very large number of cases the proportion is so great as to render the material an item not worthy of consideration—tools for repairing watches, mathematical instruments, making telescopes and other optical instruments, making jeweler's tools, and a thousand other industries.

There is an important reason for the demand for duties on articles in which we can compete. Without them we should be subject to ruinous competition by English manufacturers sending their goods to this market and selling them below cost in order to break down our industries. They organize themselves with their immense capital to break down foreign competitors, and when they have secured the markets put up prices and reimburse themselves. To illustrate, let us take the watch industry. The duty upon watches and materials under the tariff of 1840 was 10 per cent.; under the tariff of 1857, 4 and 8 per cent.; 1861, March, 10 per cent.; December, 15 per cent.; 1868, 20 and 25 per cent. Several efforts were made to establish the watch manufacture previous to 1863, but they were failures; those attempting it were ruined. Under the protection afforded since, however, they have thriven wonderfully, and American genius for organization and adaption of machinery, having been given an opportunity to get fairly into operation, has produced the most marvelous results.

American watches are now made equal to the best in the world, while for the cheaper common watches we outstrip everybody. They can be bought at from $3.50 each to $100 or more. There are nine establishments, producing 3,650 watches a day; one establishment alone turning out a watch a minute for ten hours each day. The annual product of watches and cases is upwards of $16,000,000, employing about 21,000 persons, besides the many thousands outside who produce the materials and supplies. Without protection that industry never could have grown up here. We get our watches cheaper, employ the people here, and get all the incidental benefits, which are very great. The same is true of many styles of cotton and woolen goods, of brass and other metals. The number of industries which have traveled the same road and produced the same results are a host, and to the unprejudiced American who will examine this subject in all its lights carefully it seems to me there can be but one honest conclusion, namely: That not only is the general welfare of the country largely enhanced by the encouragement of manufacture, not only do we keep up the producing power of our people, but really, estimated in dollars and cents, excluding a few exceptional cases, in the long run the consumer gets his goods nearly as cheap as the foreigner.

I want simply to call your attention to a few comparisons. I find that Mulhall says, while we have been going on under a protective system—and he is a free-trader—that our annual accumulation of wealth reaches the sum of $875,000,000. That of France is $375,000,000, and that of Great Britain $325,000,000. Germany is $200,000,000, while all other countries in the world amount to $725,000,000. Our annual accumulation is thus 35 per cent. of the profits of the whole world.

We have deposited in our savings-banks, in round numbers, $1,000,000,000. Great Britain has about $300,000,000. We have, in round numbers, 120,000 miles of railroads, costing $6,000,000,000.

All of Europe combined has but 105,000 miles, and the whole world only 264,000. The United States has 143,940 miles of telegraph lines completed, while the whole world has only 550,000 miles. According to the census of 1880 we had published in the country 10,000 periodicals, and we had an army of 275,000 school-teachers. In short, our people are better housed, better fed, better clothed, better educated than any others on earth. We have fewer paupers, fewer criminals, and a higher moral standard. We are richer in all that is desirable for man than any other nation ever was on the face of the earth. We have attained to a standard of comfort, of civilization, and the recognition of the rights and privileges of the people such as there is no parallel for in history, and all under protection; and yet our free-trade friends, not satisfied with that, are endeavoring to break us down to help free-trade England. [Applause.]

I thank the House for its courtesy.

Corn has been depressed in price on account of the tremendous increase of production. While the price of corn is comparatively lower than that of any agricultural product, still the farmer can produce it relatively cheaper, as all know who know anything about it, and he can land it cheaper at tide-water market.

But let me proceed with the table: Under free trade the farmer could buy with one bushel of wheat .91 of a sack of Liverpool salt; under protection it would buy 1.8 sacks. Under free trade the bushel of wheat would buy 8.51 yards of bleached sheeting; under protection 11.04 yards. Under free trade it would buy 422 pounds of coal; and under protection, 719 pounds. Under free trade it would buy 12.21 yards of prints; under protection, 16.27 yards. Under free trade it would buy 107.3 pounds of pig-iron; under protection, 134 pounds. Under free trade, 35.8 pounds of bar-iron; and under protection 57.35. Under free trade it would buy 47.23 pounds of railroad iron; under protection 72.6 pounds.

Take Kentucky tobacco, which will appeal to my friend over the way. Kentucky tobacco makes the best showing of any of the enumerated articles. Ten pounds of it under his tariff for revenue would buy .43 of a sack of salt, but under protection it would buy three times as much, and so on, as will appear by the table printed above.

Mr. CARLISLE. Is the gentleman taking it in the leaf?

Mr. CHACE. I am taking Burchard's report on tobacco. I admit it is not the most trustworthy, but the gentleman himself quoted from it.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, was recognized.

Mr. BLAND. If the gentleman from Arkansas will yield to me I will move that the committee now rise.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Oh, no.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the fact that there are other gentlemen, and a large number of them, here who want to be heard on this question, and for myself I think it is but due to those who are not so high upon the list as I have been placed that they should have an opportunity given to them by those who are a little ahead on that list getting out of the way as rapidly as possible. And while I make that suggestion I will also say that while I have no disposition to cut off anybody's right to have all of the time he wants, and to have his time extended if not sufficient, I hope that in the continuance of this debate there will be no more requests for an extension of the time after an hour has been occupied. If a gentleman can not say what he desires to say in an hour on this floor upon this subject, then I hope he will take the liberty of printing the remainder of his remarks and give others an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. BLAND. Now, if the gentleman from Arkansas will yield to me, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. No, let us go on to-night.

Mr. BLAND. It is now after 5 o'clock, and if the gentleman will yield I will make that motion.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. So far as I am concerned, I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that I prefer to talk to gentlemen who are not fatigued already by the discussion, but I like to be out of the way of other gentlemen who wish to be heard. If the House will patiently allow me twenty-five or thirty minutes this afternoon, then I will yield the floor, and if I have not concluded what I wish to say in that time, I will ask leave of the House to print the remainder, and will be out of the way for the remainder of the discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield for the motion?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I would prefer to continue now, if there be no objection.

Mr. BLAND. Of course if the gentlemen prefers to proceed now I shall not ask leave to submit the motion, but I thought it would be preferable to him to go on in the morning.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, the tariff question has occupied the attention of the people of the United States in a greater or less degree from the foundation of the Government down to the present time, and is yet unsettled and likely to remain so until some solution of it shall be reached which satisfies the demand for that fairness, justice, and equality which every American citizen feels to be his birthright.

Any tariff system which disregards two of the fundamental principles of all just taxation, pointed out by Adam Smith more than one hundred years ago, can never be accepted as correct by a free people. The principles so disregarded in our system are:

First. Subjects should contribute toward the support of the Government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue which they respectively enjoy under the protection of the State.

Second. Every tax ought to be so contrived as both to take out and to keep out of the pockets of the people as little as possible over and above what it brings into the public Treasury.

Under our system these two principles, which must strongly commend themselves to the approval of all just men, have been persistently and grossly violated. The people of the United States have been taxed not in proportion to their respective abilities, but really in proportion to their respective necessities. And so far from being so contrived as to take "out of the pockets of the people as little as possible over and above what it brings into the public Treasury," the system has been arranged to take as much as possible, and to divert as much as possible of what is taken from the Treasury of the Government and into the pockets of certain favored classes.

Widely differing views are held in this country upon this tariff question. Some persons favor absolute freedom of trade, while others favor a system of what is called "protection," amounting practically to prohibition, and between these extremes will be found most of our people.

However much the Republican party may hesitate to avow it openly and in direct terms as a party policy, those who have controlled its management and shaped its policy for many years have favored a tariff which had protection for its object and prime consideration, while revenue has been subordinated to it as a mere incident, and in the administration of the Government they have lived up to this idea in disregard of the just complaints of the victims of their policy. On the other hand, the masses of the Democratic party have favored a tariff the object and purpose of which is to raise the necessary revenue, and no more. As the levying of any tariff, no matter how moderate, tends to increase the price of the article upon which it is levied, there would necessarily be some protection resulting from a strictly revenue tariff; but such protection is merely an incident, unavoidably following any tariff upon any article produced in this country.

It is of course well understood that, other conditions being the same, the largest importations will take place under free trade, and that as the tariff increases, the tendency is to check importations, so that the increase of rate and decrease of importations are always the factors which determine the point of maximum revenue upon any article. After passing the maximum revenue point each increase of rates lessens importations and decreases revenue, until the point of positive prohibition is reached, when of course there will be no revenue, or the same result, so far as revenue is concerned, as free trade would produce.

During the war and for some years following it the expenditures of the Government were extraordinary and extraordinary measures were necessarily devised to provide means to meet these expenses, and to this the people cheerfully submitted. But when this abnormal state of things had passed away and the Government had more than enough to meet all demands the feeling became general that there ought to be a lessening of taxation, and at this hour this demand is widespread and imperative. As there can be no pretense that the present taxes are necessary for revenue, the truth stands out boldly that the object of the present tariff taxation is protection for the sake of protection, and this is avowed afresh by every failure to reduce taxation, and by each false pretense that it has been done.

The bill under consideration is intended to meet this demand and to effect a reasonable reduction of taxation. I am fully aware of the fact that many well-informed gentlemen believe that the adoption of this bill will increase rather than decrease the revenues. With me this would be no argument against the bill, even if this should be true, for to my mind the crying evil of the system is excess of taxation, the excess of revenue being merely the shadow to that substance. Remove the substance and the shadow will not trouble us. Besides, this argument is an admission that the tariff has been carried higher than the maximum revenue point, that it is protective for the sake of protection, and this if true makes it a matter of principle with all Democrats that it should be as rapidly as possible reduced to that point.

HORIZONTAL REDUCTION.

The bill proposes a horizontal reduction of 20 per cent. upon almost all articles, but limited by the Morrill tariff of 1861, below which nothing is to be reduced; or, in other words, all of the proposed reductions are applied to war taxes, and the tariff upon no article will under the operations of this bill be brought below the tariff of 1861. It is proposed that all shall be treated alike and that each interest shall submit to a reduction to which all others are required to submit. Only this and nothing more.

It would perhaps have been more philosophical to have attempted to correct all inequalities and incongruities in the present tariff along with this reduction; but while I have no doubt that these inequalities are glaring, yet we can not undertake in a single bill to remedy all the wrongs that the Republican party has been able to build up in twenty-three years; and as the reduction of excessive taxation is of much more importance to the people than the adjustment of irregularities among taxed articles, all too high, this bill goes in the right direction and proposes to deal with the greatest amid a multitude of lesser evils.

Any attempt to readjust the relations of the various articles in the tariff at this time would have encumbered and in some measure obscured the real object had in view by the committee, and would only have furnished grounds for cavil and fault-finding among those who do not and never did intend to have any reduction of taxation as long as it could be avoided. It was better, therefore, to present first this simple question without side issues: Shall the country twenty years after the close of the war have a moderate reduction of war taxes?

This is the question presented by this bill, and this is the question that we answer when we cast our votes upon it. Besides this argument against disturbing relations at this time, there is another that I confess has weight with me, as I am always conservative and desire to accommodate myself to the honest opinions of others as far as possible. All those gentlemen who voted for the bill of March 3, 1883, for the reason that it was the best that could be had, and was to some slight degree an improvement on the old law, and who really favor a reduction of taxation, will certainly vote for this bill, because it is, pure and simple, a reduction upon a bill which they seemed only to object to because it was too high.

If the professions of a great desire to reduce tariff taxation so freely indulged in two years ago by gentlemen on both sides of this Chamber had been earnest and sincere, there certainly would be little opposition to such a proposition as the present one now; but, unfortunately for the country, there was no such real intention then, but the Tariff Commission and the act of March 3, 1883, were mere devices to avoid carrying out their pledges and at the same time to cajole the public into a belief that some relief had been afforded. The President of the United States had recommended reduction; protectionists in Congress proclaimed that some action should be taken, and at once proceeded to abdicate the high functions pertaining to their offices and appoint the Tariff Commission, on the ground that Congress was not sufficiently informed to act intelligently in a matter of such "pith and moment." The commission was appointed and entered upon its work.

It was instructed by the act which called it into existence—

To take into consideration and to thoroughly investigate all the various questions relating to the agricultural, commercial, mercantile, manufacturing, mining, and industrial interests of the United States, so far as the same may be necessary to the establishment of a judicious tariff or a revision of the existing tariff upon a scale of justice to all interests, and for the purpose of fully examining the matters which may come before it.

In obedience to these instructions, the commission traveled over 7,000 miles, visited twenty-nine cities, and examined more than 600 witnesses, taking testimony seventy-eight days, which covers 2,625 printed pages, and reported to Congress that—

In the performance of the duty devolved upon them, all the members of the commission have aimed, and as they believe with success, to divest themselves of all political bias, sectional prejudice, or considerations of personal interest. It is their desire that their recommendations shall serve no particular party, class, section, or school of political economy.

And further that they believe that—

A subversion or radical change in the present economic system would throw labor out of employment, ruinously depreciate values, and create a general industrial and commercial disaster.

Yet they say that—

Early in its deliberations the commission became convinced that a substantial reduction of tariff duties is demanded, not by a mere indiscriminate popular clamor, but by the best conservative opinion of the country, including that which has in former times been most strenuous for the preservation of our national industrial defenses. Such a reduction of the existing tariff the commission regards not only as a due recognition of public sentiment and a measure of justice to consumers, but one conducive to the general industrial prosperity, and which, though it may be temporarily inconvenient, will be ultimately beneficial to the special interests affected by such reduction. No rates of defensive duties, except for the establishment of new industries, which more than equalize the conditions of labor and capital with those of foreign competitors can be justified. Excessive duties or those above such standard of equalization are positively injurious to the interests which they are supposed to benefit.

And all this is from the unanimous report of a commission created by a Republican and protectionist Congress, and composed of nine men, all of whom are protectionists, all of whom were selected by a protectionist President.

Further on they say:

And in the mechanical and manufacturing industries, especially those which have been long established, it would seem that the improvements in machinery and processes made within the last twenty years and the high scale of productiveness, which has become a characteristic of their establishments, would permit our manufacturers to compete with their foreign rivals under a substantial reduction of existing duties.

And they say that the average reduction of rates aimed at by them is not less than 20 per cent., and they believe it will reach 25 per cent., and then say:

If the reduction reaches the amount at which the commission has aimed, and if there is any truth in the allegation of the opponents of the present economic system that a duty on articles such as are produced in this country, whether in manufactures or agriculture, enhances the price to the consumer, not only of what is imported, but of the whole domestic production, to an amount of which the duty is a measure, the reduction proposed by the commission would benefit consumers to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars.

Why did the identical Congress which called this commission into existence upon the plea that Congress was not well enough informed upon this question to act upon it intelligently immediately repudiate the work of the commission, this pet and creation of their own, unless it was because they had never really intended any substantial reduction?

The bill reported by the commission was certainly in conformity to the recommendations of a Republican President and with the professions of protectionists in Congress, yet a Congress which had solemnly proclaimed its own incompetency to deal with this question refused to accept the work of the commission, and by organizing a conference committee, all of whom were protectionists but one, demonstrated its ability to avoid a reduction in spite of its pledges and the work of its own commission.

The reason for this sudden change is to be found in the fact that the commission was compelled to favor a real reduction, and the bill of March, 1883, made no provision for any such thing, but was an expedient to avoid action, and has accomplished no reduction worth the name. It is true that importations have been smaller under it than they were for the corresponding period in the previous year, and in consequence there has been some reduction of revenue; but the reduction in rates of taxation is merely nominal, the average under the old law being 42.65 per cent., under the new 40.91, or a reduction of only 1.74 per cent.; or, in other words, a reduction of 4 per cent. of the tax instead of the promised 25. If the pending bill should become a law, we will only have carried out and accomplished what was promised by the protectionists and was recommended by the commission.

The gentlemen who told us that the Tariff Commission was the proper means of finding out what ought to be done in this matter are estopped from denying that this bill is reasonable in the quantum of reduction.

The charge has been freely made and industriously circulated that we who favor a reduction of taxation to a revenue basis, who wish to return to what we believe to be constitutional methods, are absolute free-traders, and propose to abolish custom-houses and by violent and revolutionary methods to uproot and destroy the protected industries of this country. I do not believe that any intelligent man ever really believed this; yet the charge has done service in arraying the prejudices of those less informed, and especially the laborers in this class of industries, against us. After a full discussion of this question in the Forty-seventh Congress, the people of the country placed the Democratic party in the majority in this House, and it is right and proper that we in clear and unequivocal terms define our purposes upon this question, and no way can be so clear and effective as to pass a bill which reflects the sentiment of our party. The passage of this bill will be a complete answer to all the charges of violent intentions, and will again in an authoritative manner announce to the country that we favor "reformation, not revolution."

ACTION NECESSARY.

I can not agree with some of my party friends that because we are in the majority in but one House of Congress therefore we should not attempt anything affecting the tariff at this time. If we have been in earnest for the last forty years in our party declarations on this question, we certainly will not fail to give expression to those views in a way more effective than the generalities of a political platform now that we are in the majority in the popular branch of Congress. If we place ourselves on record in favor of just and moderate measures in the direction of a return to constitutional methods, we will have redeemed our party pledges; and if then the Republican party chooses to assume the responsibility of preventing all efforts at even a moderate reduction of taxation, the issue will be fairly made up and the country will decide between us.

The course of doing nothing would be simply dodging this great question, and, as I believe the utmost frankness and sincerity is always the best policy, I am in favor of boldly occupying Democratic ground.

If the country thinks with us on the question, this course will inspire confidence; and if it does not, dodging will not deceive the people nor strengthen us.

We should be consistent with our party declarations and with our own expressions. Mr. RANDALL in the debate upon this question in the last Congress well said:

I do not favor a tariff enacted upon the ground of protection simply for the sake of protection, because I doubt the existence of any constitutional warrant for any such construction or the grant of any such power. It would manifestly be in the nature of class legislation, and to such legislation, a favoring one class at the expense of another, I have always been opposed.

This is a clear and strong statement of the difference between the Republican and Democratic parties upon this question; and as all of us have sworn to support the Constitution, we who are Democrats can not fail, at every opportunity, to try to bring the present high and oppressive protective tariff—levied "simply for the sake of protection," "without constitutional warrant," and "in the nature of class legislation," "favoring one class at the expense of another," to which we as Democrats "have always been opposed"—down to the basis of a constitutional tariff, one levied for revenue. On such a proposition there is no middle ground for Democrats.

That the present rates of Federal taxation are excessive no one can deny, for the fact stares us in the face that we are collecting annually from eighty to one hundred millions of dollars more than the Government needs. One of the oft-repeated arguments against this bill is that its passage or even its discussion will disturb business, and that its mere discussion in committee has already done so, and many claim that the passage of the last tariff act was a tacit agreement not to disturb the tariff further for years, and they always close with the assurance that "what the country most needs is a little rest." One of the great errors, according to my view, of the protectionists is that they seem always to be utterly oblivious to the fact that anybody exists except themselves. They seem never to know that there are millions of people in this country, embracing the bone and sinew of the land, who have the greatest possible interest in this question, and who, under the iniquitous system of so-called protection, are annually compelled by the operations of unequal and unjust laws to contribute hundreds of millions of dollars for the purpose of making other lines of business profitable, some of which within and of themselves, and without "protection," perhaps could not exist.

These people have been taught that this was designed to be a government of the people and for the people; and they do not believe that their inalienable and God-given right to labor and enjoy the fruits of their labor can be bargained away by any conference committee of Congress, and they will not fail to set the seal of their condemnation upon such assumption—a tacit contract indeed—when the consumers of this country actually had no day in court, no chance to be heard, no opportunity even to protest except by the mouth of one single representative against the passage of the bill of 1883. Those who divided among themselves the raiment of the Saviour of mankind had just as legal and valid a right to their plunder as have the parties to this iniquitous scheme to a vested right to go on with this plundering for ten years.

We agree with them that "what the country most needs is a little rest," but the rest it needs is rest from unjust exactions, rest from having the most ill-fed and ill-paid class of the people, and who do more man for man to build up the country and add to its material wealth than any other class, compelled to contribute of their scant and hard earnings to swell the splendor and wealth of a class who contribute less to the advancement of the country than they get from it. This rest will come. The power is in the hands of the oppressed, and they will yet dare be free.

EXCESS OF REVENUE.

A revenue largely in excess of the necessary expenses of the Government is unquestionably a great evil. The withdrawal of large sums of money from the ordinary channels of business must of necessity tend to obstruct and restrict commercial transactions over the entire country, thereby unsettling values and disturbing all business. Besides this, the presence of large accumulations in the Treasury, for which there is no demand in the ordinary management of the affairs of the nation, must in the nature of things promote extravagance in the disbursement and more especially in the appropriations for even the commonest expenses. The knowledge of such an accumulation will foster and encourage among the people demands to "unlock the vaults of the Treasury" in obedience to all sorts of local demands with little regard to their merits. The watchfulness, too, of the general public over the expenditures of public money is lulled by such a condition of things, and dishonest officials find therein their opportunity for jobs and all manner of frauds. All these are evils, and should beyond any question be provided against by having only so much money collected from the people as the imperative demands of the nation may require, and I am as anxious as any one can be to avoid these evils.

While we should meet this question and dispose of it, it is our duty to accomplish it by the mode most in accord with the general interest of the people. We should not in our efforts to get rid of this trouble fasten upon ourselves another, before which this pales into insignificance.

The general demand for a reduction of taxation of course receives new vigor from this excess of revenue, which can not be avoided or explained away in argument. The problem then which presents itself to the protectionists for solution is how to reduce the revenues and get rid of this surplus, and at the same time reduce tariff taxation as little as possible. Their system, "in the nature of class legislation, favoring one class at the expense of another," to use Mr. RANDALL'S forcible language, must be saved if their ingenuity can devise the means of being rid of our surplus revenue, aside from the reduction of their taxes.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The best means of reaching this end, now so earnestly desired by all the protectionists, is to abolish the entire internal-revenue system and save alive and unharmed the more unjust and oppressive tariff system. I would not object to an abolition of the tobacco tax and the tax on brandy distilled from fruits, because this can be done without rendering the maintenance of the tariff system, as at present framed, a necessity, and because this is the most obnoxious branch of the internal-revenue system, and because, further, it is a tax, in the case of tobacco, on a raw agricultural product, and is by its operation, like the tariff system in the ad valorem tax, being increased to the poorer classes, while it is decreased to the consumers of costly tobacco. The fruit distillations are a small matter—of no consequence to the Government, and the revenue from it does not compensate for the annoyance to the growers of fruit. But the great source of internal revenue should be kept as now until we have had relief from tariff taxation. If our entire system of Federal taxation was so contrived as both to "take out and to keep out of the pockets of the people as little as possible over and above what it brings into the public Treasury," there would be little difficulty in accomplishing this purpose; but, unfortunately for the great mass of consumers, unfortunately for 90 per cent. of the people of the United States, such is not the effect of the laws, and, unfortunately for them all and for the cause of human liberty, such is not their object.

While no law can be found upon the statute-book of this nation which directly and in terms lays any tax for the open and avowed purpose of being collected for the benefit of a mere private citizen, yet in practical operation such is the effect of some of the laws under which we now live and such is the invariable result of protection.

Cotton-spinning machinery costing abroad $10,000 must when brought into this country pay the Government $4,500 duty; hence the purchaser in this country must pay $14,500 for what he could have had for $10,000 but for this tariff tax. Of this amount of course $4,500 goes into the Treasury, $10,000 to the foreign manufacturer. The American manufacturer of similar machinery, who but for the tariff would have been compelled to sell for $10,000 or have no buyer, can now force the American buyer to pay him the $14,500. Here is a tax the result of the law, and yet not directly and in terms laid by it. It is none the less a tax upon the buyer of American machinery. But of this tax the Government gets not one cent, but all of it goes to the pockets of the manufacturer. If it is right that money should be taken from one citizen to be given to another by such indirect methods, why not do it directly and let everybody know exactly how much of his property is to be taken from him to be given to others, and not have the amount unknown, as now. This would certainly be the more manly and honest method of accomplishing the same result.

The intenal-revenue laws, or practically the tax upon spirits and tobacco, yield the Government about $150,000,000 per annum, and all of this tax, less the expense of collecting it (about $5,000,000), finds its way into the Treasury. There is no semblance of protection in all the system, however much we may dislike it. It can not be used in any manner to put money into the pockets of private citizens, while on the other hand the tariff or the taxes on all manner of imported goods yields the Government about $190,000,000 per annum, but, being protective by increasing the prices of all similar domestic goods to the consumers, it operates as an indirect tax amounting to "hundreds of millions of dollars per annum." Just how much this tax is can not be definitely ascertained, and estimates vary greatly—from five hundred to one thousand million dollars per annum; but it is none the less certain and none the less oppressive and unjust because levied and collected by such indirect means as to prevent a full and exact knowledge of all its effects.

It is clear, then, how it becomes a matter of great concern to the consumers as a class whether the proposed reduction be made by abolishing the internal-revenue system or by a reduction of tariff taxes. Each reduction of revenue from the first will represent just the same reduction of taxes and no more, while in the case of the tariff each reduction of $1 of revenue will represent a reduction of $1 of tax in favor of the Government, and from $4 to $6 reduction of taxes which are collected from the people, but which go to the manufacturers, or while the Government gives up $1 the manufacturer gives up $5 or $6. This will explain the opposition of the protectionists to the reduction of the tariff, and why it is that just now they so vociferously demand the repeal of the entire internal-revenue system. How the righteous souls of the protectionists are now vexed by the outrages of the minions of the Federal Treasury upon the poor moonshiners in the mountains of Kentucky and Tennessee. Those things existed a long time without eliciting one word of sympathy from the warm-hearted protectionists, but the moment they found their system was in danger, the moment they are likely to be restrained in the pocketing of hundreds of millions of the property of others each year, that moment they wake up to the wrongs of the poor moonshiner and they are ready to do battle for him with their tongues and ballots and a part of their money if thereby they can save themselves. If their sudden interest in these poor fellows can hoodwink enough voters, the internal-revenue system will be swept off the face of the earth, and then the complacent protectionist can comfort himself that he has another long term of the right to pocket annually hundreds of millions of the earnings of other men.

That party which loves to parade its high moral ideas, and which loves to pray standing at the corners of the streets, those who thank God that they are better than other men, will be but too glad to become the patrons and champions of cheap whisky if they can thereby continue to reap where they have not sown. They will rejoice to make whisky free if thereby they can maintain their right to levy their accursed toll upon every article of necessity that ministers to the comfort of the poor.

Mr. Chairman, the time has come when the consumers of manufactured products of this country—the great body of the people, those who bear the burden in the heat of the day—should, if they do not emulate the selfishness of the protectionists, at least determine that they will no longer be hewers of wood and drawers of water for them in a country where all are born equal and ought to have equal rights under equal laws. The protectionist has proved that no one knows better than he that "he who would be well taken care of must take care of himself," and it is time now that the other class should learn the lesson. In this connection let us look at

A FEW FACTS.

The census of 1880 shows that $2,790,223,506 of capital is invested in manufacturing enterprises in the United States, and that their gross product is $5,369,667,706. Deduct $3,394,340,029 material used in this manufacture, and we have left $1,975,327,677 as their product; and to produce this result 2,738,930 persons are employed.

Engaged in farming we find that we have—

Value of farms	$10,197,096,776
Value of farm implements	406,520,055
Value of live-stock	1,500,464,609

not deducting one cent for fertilizers, seed, and other materials. The gross production is $2,212,540,927, and to produce this result 7,670,493 persons are employed; or the manufacturing enterprises yield, after deducting materials used, over 70 per cent. upon the capital invested, while farming pays less than 19 per cent.; yet farming is heavily taxed to increase the profits of the manufacturers; and when we ask by this bill a reduction of but one-fifth of this burden of taxation we are gravely told that the manufacturers can not afford it. No account is taken of what a farmer can or can not afford; but his forced contribution while living upon a gross product of 19 per cent. upon his capital invested must be kept up to swell the wealth of those making more than 70 per cent. Again, each laborer in manufactures, after deducting cost of materials used, produces $721.20, while each laborer in farming produces but $288.44, nothing whatever being deducted for materials; and yet hundreds of millions must be taken from one class to be given to the other. And this is what protectionists tell us is building up the country.

This system of so-called protection; this invoking the aid of the Government to compel all the people of the country by the operation of unjust and unequal laws to contribute to the wealth of a class; this fear of meeting fairly in the open markets of the world the citizens of other countries, being driven out of the markets of all the world except our own, and retaining them only by skulking behind commercial Chinese walls, more suited to the Middle Ages than the nineteenth century, is the most cowardly and thoroughly un-American, if I may be allowed to coin a word, that has ever fastened itself upon a people who supposed themselves to be free, and its approach has been like that of a thief, stealthy and under false pretenses. At first it only claimed a place as an incident to the necessary revenue, but, gathering strength and greed with age, it now, in the insolence of wealth and pride of power, demands that the great constitutional power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States," shall become subordinate to and a mere incident of protection; and we hear men of power and influence avow that they advocate not a tariff for revenue with incidental protection, but a tariff for protection with incidental revenue, thus setting up the most monstrous iniquity in this country as being higher and more sacred than the Constitution itself.

A HANDFUL THAT HAVE NOT BOWED THE KNEE TO BAAL.

But in the midst of all this there is now and then a struggling spark of American manhood which has not been debauched. My heart was made glad some time ago by meeting a delegation of American artists who came here to ask that the work of their competitors, the artists of Europe, be allowed to come into this country free of duty. I was glad to see that there were yet some Americans, even though very few in numbers, who have the spirit of '76, who believed that they could successfully meet competitors from all countries. These men came not asking the Government to keep the American markets for Americans who could not take care of themselves in open competition, nor to compel Americans who might want to buy pictures to buy from them; on the contrary, they asked to be allowed to meet the artists of all other lands on terms of perfect equality, on our own soil or elsewhere.

Here was a class of men who did not want the mailed hand of the Government laid upon other callings to put money into their purses. It was a refreshing sight to see that one class had at last come to the seat of government that was not skulking behind obstructive commercial laws to cover up their own deficiencies and want of skill—men who were actually not afraid to meet competitors from all parts of the globe.

Mr. Chairman, I have lived all my life in the Southwest and have been accustomed to look at this great Yankee nation too much from a Fourth of July standpoint, I suppose. You may guess, then, what a shock it was to me to find that Brother Jonathan did not go abroad, as I had supposed, with his long hair, ill-fitting boots, dressed in a suit made of the Stars and Stripes, with a face as sharp as his scent was keen for a bargain, striding up and down in the earth seeking whom he might trade with, ready to swap jack-knives, manufacture wooden nutmegs, sawdust sausages, bogus railroad stocks, or salted mining shares, as the state of the market might seem to suggest, or the elevation of the morals of the world to the high protectionist standard might seem to demand.

My idea had always been that Jonathan was possibly a trifle vain, perhaps egotistical, but I did not think he regarded man or feared the devil in a trade, but that he felt himself able to hold his own under all circumstances and everywhere; that he could and did make as fine a quality of olive-oil out of cotton-seed as could be found on earth, and that he regularly poured it as an oil of gladness into the stomachs of the French and Italians. Think, then, sir, how I felt when it came out before the Ways and Means Committee a few days ago that by tricks Johnny Bull had actually run him out of the Mexican cotton-goods market by making an imitation of Yankee goods out of cheap cotton, starch, and dirt, and Jonathan was compelled by such competition to fold his tent and silently steal away. But the crushing blow came when a good man, representing the high morality and culture of the down-East protectionists, assured the committee that the all-silk goods of American manufacture, which we protect by 60 per cent., actually contain only one-third cotton; and another quite vanquished me by telling us how, by a pious fraud, our people passed American hose on an unsuspecting American public for British manufacture, and made them so like the real, genuine, honest article that a shopkeeper sold a large lot of them to a manufacturer's wife at about 300 per cent. upon what he had originally paid her husband for them. It is enough to make the angels weep to see the innate honesty of our guileless people so taken advantage of by the rascally British. We can impose upon our people and swindle them to our heart's content with our all-silk goods only one-third cotton and our "real British" hose if you will only keep the vile English away. But let them come here, miserable wretches, and they will expose us, bring real culture and refinement into contempt, and certainly beat us at our own game, as they did in Mexico, and we will be forced out of the market and out of business. There was some show of reason and perhaps fairness in the old Georgian who, when challenged to fight a duel by a one-legged man, insisted on his right to have one of his legs incased in a section of a hollow log so as to make the chances even. But our manufacturers, afraid of a fair fight in open market, absolutely crawl clear into the gum, head and heels.

To men who understand what human nature is it is perfectly apparent that the object of imposing a protective duty upon any article imported into this country, and which is also produced here, is simply to enable the American producer of that article to compel the American consumer of it to pay him a higher price for it than he would have to pay if there was no protection. There is absolutely nothing in protection if this is not true, and no one will deny that this is the effect and the object of such a duty.

WHAT PROTECTION COSTS.

Just how much the people of this country are by this means compelled to contribute to the producers of protected articles can not be exactly stated, yet by considering the prices at home and abroad of protected articles and the amount in value of such goods consumed we may approximate the amount.

Hon. S. S. COX, of New York, one of the most accomplished and versatile men in American politics, a man who has devoted a lifetime to the service of his country, and who, I am happy to say, is yet young, has estimated the amount thus collected from the people at large for the benefit of a class at from seven hundred and fifty to one thousand millions of dollars per annum, Professor A. L. Perry has estimated the yearly amount since the war at $600,000,000; and Hon. WILLIAM M. SPRINGER, of Illinois, than whom there is no more ceaseless worker and clear-headed man in this House, estimates it at $556,000,000.

The following table, which I find in an article in the North American Review for June, 1883, I subjoin, as showing his manner of arriving at his conclusion.

Statement showing the amount of incidental taxes annually imposed on the people of the United States in the increased cost of home products by reason of discriminating duties on imported articles of like character, together with the value of such home products, the amount of wages paid and number of hands employed, and the imports and duties received thereon, for the year 1882.

a Planters' product for 1880 was: Sugar, 196,759,200 pounds; molasses, 16,573,273 gallons. Number and wages of laborers not stated.

These statements are enough to show that enormous sums of money, amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, are by the operation of protection in the United States taken from all the people to benefit a class year by year, and this has gone on without interruption ever since the close of the war. Does it seem possible that the resources of any nation on earth could have stood such a drain and at the same time have paid the enormous sums which we as a nation have paid to liquidate the national debt and the interest on it, and to meet the current expenses of the nation and its immense pension-roll at the same time? And who paid and who received all this?

The census of 1880 shows that all the persons engaged in manufacturing, mechanic, and mining industries numbered 3,837,112; in agriculture, 7,670,493; in trade and transportation, 1,810,256; professional occupations, 4,074,238; total, 17,392,099.

HOW MANY ARE TAXED.

Mr. SPRINGER'S table shows 1,327,881 persons engaged in protected industries, not counting sugar and rice, and a few other industries of little importance, which he thinks would not swell the number above 1,500,000. This would leave 15,892,099 persons engaged in occupations practically not protected, and these are taxed this enormous sum for the benefit of 1,500,000; or less than 10 per cent. of persons are protected while over 90 per cent. are taxed for their benefit. Or, if Mr. COX'S lowest estimate is correct, $500 for each man, woman, and child employed in protected industries is legislated out of the pockets of the people, and for which nothing whatever is rendered; the same thing as taking this out of other people's pockets by taxation and giving this pet class $500 each.

Under the Constitution of the United States Congress has power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," but it has no right to lay and collect taxes for any such purpose as this. But even if Congress had the constitutional right to levy taxes for any such purpose, it would be cruel and unjust and a violation of all natural laws to exercise it, and the American people would hurl from power any party attempting to exercise it if it was fully understood.

Asking protection is a confession that the business proposed to be protected within and of itself can not be profitable. It is in effect saying that he who proposes to do so can not engage in the business without suffering loss by it, but that he will engage in it if the Government will compel the general public to make up his loss to him and then pay him a profit. And this is what protectionists call building up the country! It is useless to argue such a proposition—it is nonsense; it is worse, it is an outrage on its face. Any business conducted at a loss, whether to the owner or the country, must detract from the general wealth of the country, and shifting the loss from him who ought to bear it to the shoulders of men who have no interest in the matter does not mend it in the least.

PROTECTIONISTS' PLEAS.

The arguments which protectionists seem most fond of presenting as a compensation to the public for all these wrongs are, first, that protection protects American labor against the pauper labor of Europe; second, that it builds up home markets for farm products; third, that it builds up and develops the country and increases the wealth of the nation; and fourth, that ultimately the competition among our own manufacturers will give our people cheaper products than they would have had without protection.

The fallacy of all these positions has been again and again pointed out, and yet they are asserted now with as much vehemence as they ever were. Of course men can not be easily convinced against their wills or their interest, and we can not hope to convince those who reap the harvest in this system of unjust legislation to admit that it is wrong, at least so long as it is profitable; but fortunately for the interest of justice a very small per cent. of the American people are so interested, and when the system is fairly understood by the whole people we may reasonably expect a condemnation of all that is vicious in it.

The real interest of the protected industries in labor are twofold, one is to employ it at the lowest market rates, due regard being had to efficiency, and the other is to secure votes by inducing the laborers to believe that in some way they are interested in these indirect gains. The latter is the reason of the prominence always given by our protectionists to the duty of protecting our labor against the pauper labor of Europe, and it is absolutely false.

> Hateful to me as are the gates of hell
> Is he who hiding one thing in his heart
> Utters another.

While the protectionists are parading themselves and their system as the real friends of the American laborer and his only protector against the "pauper labor of Europe," it may be instructive to call to mind how this peculiar solicitude for the good of the laborers operates.

In the matter of tin-plates, for example, when they are brought into this country to be manufactured into cans for fruits, or vegetables, or oil for the American market they pay a tax of 1 cent per pound, or over 25 per cent.; but when they are brought here made into cans, filled with fruits, or vegetables, or coal oil, and shipped abroad, then nine-tenths of the duty is refunded, so that the American canned fruits, vegetables, meats, and fish, which find their way to the home of an American laborer as a luxury, or to the hut of an American miner as a necessity, pay nine times as much tax on the can as is paid by the pauper laborer of Europe, against whom this system so vigilantly protects him, and the amount of money so refunded upon five articles during the last fiscal year was $1,345,757.77, while nothing was remitted or even asked for in favor of our people.

Now Congress is being asked to return the other one-tenth to the exporter, which will be the entire tax, and they all assure us that this is right; but when this bill proposes to reduce the tax on our own people 20 per cent. they assure us that it will ruin the country! This is one instance where great numbers might be given showing that this system discriminates against our own people.

CAPITAL PROTECTED, BUT NOT LABOR.

In all the great protected manufacturing establishments much the larger part of the work is done by machines, but much must be done by human hands. The machinery in these mills is all protected from the competition of similar English machinery by a tax of 45 per cent., for no mill can be set up here in opposition to those already going except by paying this tax, but the laborers can be brought from an English mill and employed here in competition with American laborers, and they pay no such tax. And this is as the protectionist would have it. How then can he pose as the special friend of the American laborer? We can not limit this freedom of immigration. We are glad to see the oppressed and ill-paid of other lands seeking homes among us, but when they do come, as they have done, let them be willing to take an even start and a fair chance in life and take care of themselves, and not ask the Government to tax our people to support them.

When they come here from abroad and displace American laborers from American mills it does not look well in them to demand that the Government shall protect them "against the pauper labor of Europe." Mr. COX, of New York, in a recent speech in this House, estimates the foreign labor in our mills at 64 per cent., and it is to protect these people against their brothers and sisters across the water that the protectionists want protection.

With an open field and full competition it is not likely that bananas would be grown for market in New Hampshire, or buckwheat in Louisiana, but people would engage in natural occupations. Each man and each nation would utilize the advantages that nature and nature's God has given them, and the world would be better and more cheaply served than now, and the condition of no class would be more ameliorated by this general emancipation than the American laborers. Then it would not be a curse to the general public, as it is now, to find one of the great storehouses of God in our mountains and fields.

In the last Congress, when an effort was made to protect this country from a flood of heathen Chinese labor, the cheapest and most immoral in the world, people who can and will live upon what would be starvation wages to any American, the protectionists were found voting against it. They are willing to levy taxes to enrich themselves under the pretense of protecting American labor, but they always want and actually get the cheapest labor possible.

AMERICAN AGAINST ENGLISH WAGES.

But how much truth is there in the claim that British labor is cheaper than American? Let us see.

In a letter of Mr. W. H. Young we have the opinion of a practical manufacturer, as follows:

COLUMBUS, GA., March 13, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I have your letter of 10th instant, in which you ask my views as to what effect a reduction of 20 per cent. would have on the cotton manufacturing interests of the South. To the question I answer unhesitatingly, none.

The South is now engaged in manufacturing, say, standard (or heavy-weight) goods, and which are mainly consumed by the masses of our population South and North; and now the South sends her surplus productions to the North, where they displace all such heavy-weight goods as were formerly made there and sent South. These advantages (in all such goods) must ever remain with the South, over New England and Old England; and New England, on account of closer proximity to the cotton-fields, has a relative advantage over Old England.

A reduction of 20 per cent. in the tariff would not enable England to compete with this country, North or South, in these heavy-weight goods; but if the tariff on all articles entering into the cost of manufacturing in this country were also reduced 20 per cent., then the manufacturers North and South would be benefited; and if the duties on all such goods entering into the cost of manufacturing were made free, then the North and South could compete with England in all markets of the world. The tariff as it now stands of course shuts out all foreign competition with manufacturing productions in this country (except a few specialties of fine goods for the wealthy); and it locks in their productions, and thus confines them to the home demand; and, as a consequence, there is now a glut of goods. To illustrate my position, the company over which I preside consumes about fifty bales of cotton per day. A New England mill consuming that amount of cotton would have to pay $350 per day more for it than it costs this company, and a mill in England would have to pay more than that.

These advantages are so great that the tariff (if entirely removed) would not enable England to compete with this country on heavy-weight goods, and if the tariff was removed on all articles that enter into the cost of manufacturing, then this country could command the markets of the world and the supremacy of England would be ended.

I have visited England three times and have investigated the cost of labor compared with the South and found it more (or higher) than here, and yet our operatives were in better condition from the fact that food costs less with us, and clothing also, as our climate does not require such heavy clothing.

I think labor at the North about the same as in England.

I also investigated the cost and selling price of heavy cotton goods and concluded I could sell in England at a profit, but to do so I must adopt their peculiarities of styles, and I prefer a home market.

I believe if all our custom-houses were abolished that this country would find (in England) a large market for our manufactures of cotton and woolen goods. Now, this country is heavily taxed with almost everything that enters into the cost of production, beginning with machinery and ending with the baling the goods with Scotch burlaps.

I believe the manufacturing interests in this country, with their natural advantages, if free from all tariff legislation, would soon become the great manufacturing center.

Yours, truly,

EAGLE AND PHENIX MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
W. H. YOUNG, President.

Hon. HUGH BUCHANAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

He says that there is no difference in cost of English labor and that of New England in the mills, and this would seem probable.

When any commodity is high here and low in England, it naturally comes here until the increasing supply here lowers the market and the decreasing supply there increases the price until an equilibrium is restored. We readily see why a difference in prices might not suddenly or readily induce persons to change vocations, but what reason is there why men for better wages should not change mills when the work is the same? An English laborer coming to the United States does not change his language, and is really now but a few days away from his childhood's home and in "the land of the free;" why do not the English mill operatives come over to the American mills in numbers?

A protectionist before the Committee on Ways and Means at this session had to admit that he had known numbers of English mill operatives to return to England from the United States to work for smaller nominal wages than they received here, and said that he supposed that the reason was that they could get more of the comforts of life there for their wages than here for wages received here. No system of high tariff is in operation there to raise the price of every article the laborer has to buy as is the case here; hence his expenses are less and on smaller nominal wages he lives better and saves more. The "forty-niner" who got $100 per week for work seemed to be doing well as compared to the man who was working in the States at $30 per month, until you found that the Californian paid $99 per week board. Common sense suggests to every man that if there was a great advantage in the prices of labor here over England for the same class and character of work that the laborers would come here in numbers. Our climate is as good as theirs; our Government certainly compares favorably with theirs; the possibilities here are as great as there.

SUPPLY AND DEMAND.

The truth is, supply and demand regulate the price of labor just as anything else, as was clearly shown by a protectionist during this session in a statement to the Committee on Ways and Means, that, while the tariff upon his product had been increased by the recent act, his mill had lowered wages 10 per cent., and he gave as the reason for this reduction that such reduction was general. Yet this man will tell the mill-men at home that the reason he wants protection is to enable him to pay them high wages, and that their interests demand that they shall so vote. Will American laborers always believe such stuff? This claim is a repetition of the old fable of the lion and the beasts hunting in partnership—the prey all belonged to the lion. This is illustrated as follows: By Mr. SPRINGER's table we find that the 1,372,881 persons engaged in the really protected industries receive as wages $463,606,049, and deducting therefrom the totals in census reports we find that the 1,345,918 persons engaged in manufacturing industries, mainly not protected, receive $477,719,876 wages, or a smaller number of persons receive a larger aggregate of wages in unprotected than in protected industries. This of itself demonstrates the hollowness of all pretenses that protection is intended to benefit labor.

The protected industries enumerated by Mr. SPRINGER receive as a subsidy from protection really very much more than his cautious and conservative estimate, but for the sake of this argument accept it as correct. Then we see that while five hundred and fifty-six millions is paid to the manufacturers by the public at large, under the pretense that it is to benefit labor, the protected manufacturers only pay their labor total wages four hundred and sixty-three millions, or, allowing that they pay their labor nothing at all but that the public pays it all, then they coolly pocket about one hundred millions. Is that one hundred millions to protect anybody against the pauper labor of Europe? And this is the way the philanthropy of the average protectionist turns out upon analysis.

It is not protection but supply and demand that regulate the rate of wages in all manufacturing industries, protected and unprotected, and all the pretenses of the protectionists to the contrary are false and fraudulent.

AGRICULTURAL LABOR.

I consider it safe to assume that one-half, or really more than one-half, of all the laborers in the United States are engaged in agricultural pursuits. Their strong hands and clear heads, with God's blessings in rain and sunshine, by the help of fertile fields, absolutely create 1,547,901,790 bushels of corn per annum, over 500,000,000 bushels wheat, 300,000,000 bushels of oats, besides $250,000,000 worth of cotton and more than $300,000,000 worth of hay (furnishing more than $700,000,000 of your $800,000,000 of exports). The men who produce all this must enter the markets of the world and have the value of their products fixed in competition, not with the labor of England, the best paid and best fed in Europe, not in competition even with the labor of Europe, but the value of their crops is fixed in open competition with the labor of Asia, Africa, and South America. No matter how rude and uncultivated, no matter how poorly paid or poorly fed, the American farmer must meet this class of labor on an equal footing, and yet he is asked to contribute hundreds of millions year by year to protect the laborers of the mills from meeting on an equal footing the laborers of England. With what kind of conscience, if any, must the protectionist be endowed who can make such a demand?

When the farmer finds that he can not sustain himself by producing his crop at the price that the foreign competition compels him to accept, you do not find him coming to the Government like a mendicant and a coward and saying, "I am driven out of the markets of the world by foreign labor; you must tax my neighbors to make my losing business profitable." If his business does not pay he changes it, lives on less or works harder, saves more carefully, denies himself and his family more, but ask the Government to take the hard earnings of another business and give it to him—never! Why, then, ask him to submit to what he himself would spurn if offered him?

INFANT INDUSTRIES.

But by way of reconciling us to being plundered the protectionist tells us that their object is only to help infant industries.

In all the catalogue of protective duplicity and sharp practice there is nothing more transparent than this. Yet I believe that the idea that this system was only to last a very short time and was really only intended to aid enterprises in the first years of their existence fastened this system upon the American people, and that if the real effect of such legislation had been known and understood at the beginning as we know and understand it, from the logic of events it never would have obtained a foothold in any free country.

Hamilton, in March, 1792, in advocating an increase of tariff, said:

The addition of 2½ per cent will constitute an important though not an excessive augmentation. Nevertheless it is proposed that it shall be only temporary; and there is reasonable ground for expectation that the cause for having recourse to it will not be of long continuance.

So far from the promises of those early times being realized the reverse has proved true, and instead of infant enterprises growing up and becoming strong under protection, they have become more and more helpless as they have grown, until an average tariff of 11 per cent. in 1792 has grown to more than 40 per cent. in 1883, an increase of 300 per cent. in the protection necessary to keep these infants alive, and now we are gravely assured that if we reduce the 300 per cent. increase by one-fifth we will ruin the country. We have tried the hot-bed system long enough; let us now take some of the props away from the infant and teach him to walk alone. Such treatment may give him less fat, but it will give him more muscle, and I believe it would be followed by a healthy, natural growth and development, and that we should soon be rid of this infant standing around the door of the Ways and Means Committee room with a treatise on protection in his hand and eternally, Oliver Twist like, crying "More!"

The representatives of numbers of these protected interests have appeared here this session and tell us solemnly that the reduction proposed in this bill, this moderate reduction, this return not to but only toward the tariff of twenty-three years ago, will absolutely destroy the protected industries of the country. If this is true, how long will their infancy last? They seem to be younger now than when they first begun, as higher duties are needed now than were then to maintain them.

The fact alone of the necessity for continually increasing this tax to keep this system up is enough to satisfy any man that the whole scheme is a violation of nature and that it was "conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity." Ninety years ago this business was perhaps an infant, but ninety years of living on the labor of others, ninety years of cowering before their cousins across the water, ninety years of skulking away from an open, manly competition has, I am afraid, brought on an old age of splendid decrepitude. But the protectionists claim that while the first and immediate effect of a protective tariff is to raise the price of the protected articles, this increase in price invariably stimulates production, and, if the manufacture is really profitable, that so much capital and so many persons at once engage in the business as to bring down the prices by competition to a point lower than was attained before protection, and they point to many instances of great reductions in prices which have occurred subsequent to the imposition of protective duties. Many, if not all of them, assume that whatever reductions in the prices of protected articles occur subsequent to the imposition of protective duties result from such imposition.

While this argument sometimes has an air of plausibility it is extremely erroneous and fallacious. That some such result should occur in some instances may be true, but the reduction in price produced by competition can not be permanently below the cost of producing the article. The limit, then, of the reduction of prices is the point at which the production yields a fair profit upon the cost of production. This point will be reached by healthy competition without protection. Too many persons engaging in the production of any article stimulated by high prices must inevitably result in overproduction, and this the protectionists tell us is one of the greatest evils we have to contend against and results inevitably in a general injury to the entire business. The simple common sense, then, of what they advise is to bring ruin upon themselves if it operates as they tell us it will do. But if they mean that competition will stimulate the manufacturer to try to attain greater skill, to devise better appliances—in farmer phrase, "make every edge cut"—so that he may produce his goods and sell them at a profit, at a price that the production alone costs his less skillful and less thrifty neighbor, then, in that event, the more competition we have the more vigorous and persistent will all these efforts be.

If this is true, and who can doubt it, then the field of competition should be the widest possible, not only in production, but in sales, and the gauge should be thrown down to the whole world to meet on terms of equality everywhere, and let the highest skill and best work for the price take the prize. In this rational contest I would have no fear of results for this country, because I believe that freedom and brains will win in every contest.

The truth is that these reductions in price which happen to follow high tariff are not the result of protection at all, but are the result of a natural, healthy competition supplemented by improved machinery and improved methods generally, and for this improved machinery we are indebted to the inventive genius of the world and not to protection. The invention and successful operation of a cotton-picker will reduce the price of cotton, and this will cheapen cotton goods; and then I expect to see some protectionist devoutly thankful that protection has invented a cotton-picker. Just for the world as they now claim that steel rails have been reduced by protection, while they and all the world know that they have been brought down by Bessemer's invention, and that but for the monopolists and protectionists they would have been brought down here as low as they were in free-trade England.

It has been sometimes claimed that all the protection we need in this country is just enough to compensate for the difference in the cost of labor, and this is the statement of the Tariff Commission, but now the protectionists insist that with labor at the same price here as in England our mills can not compete with them because our mills cost so much more than theirs. Why do our mills cost more? A protected manufacturer before the Committee on Ways and Means, in explaining his business, stated that his mill cost $450,000; that a similar mill in England would cost $300,000. The machinery in his mill he stated cost $300,000, and that similar machinery in England would have cost about $200,000. The tariff tax on $200,000 worth of machinery brought from England here would be $90,000. Here is $90,000 out of a difference in cost of $150,000 accounted for in one item, and that item is a tax.

Land and stone and sand are as cheap here as in England, certainly. If, then, labor was as cheap here as there what other item of cost would there be to run up the expense of building a mill?

Nothing on earth except this tax upon his machinery, his tools, his materials, that the protectionists insist is so necessary to build up the country. Then we have the imposition of the tax given as the reason for more tax, and the reason and the sole reason why we can not meet our English competitors openly and fairly. Why not remove the obstacle?

REAL PROTECTION.

Then real intelligent protection lies in attaining the highest possible intelligence in all our people, in cultivating independence and individuality all over the country, and by every means possible facilitating the acquisition and rapid, cheap, and safe transportation of all machinery and supplies and appliances of every nature to the mills, with the fewest possible delays and at the minimum cost, instead of as now, by all sorts of obstructive measures, delaying and rendering more costly to our people all these things.

If an American could build his mill as cheaply, get all of his material as cheaply, and do his work as well as an Englishman, why can he not meet him fairly? Would he under such circumstances decline the contest? Would he wish to hide himself behind obstructive laws, content to be whipped out of the markets of the world, and to only be able to hold his own home market by the help of laws which in their operation logically proclaim all modern facilities of commerce a curse and an evil? Give our people an even start and an equal chance, and I have faith in the superiority of their intelligence and spirit and do not doubt their success for a moment.

But, situated as we now are, our manufacturers are handicapped from the start, and with each succeeding step weight is added until they are absolutely borne down by the weight of so-called "protection." The system is wrong in principle, and will grow worse as it grows older until natural laws must assert themselves and right the wrongs of years.

At the conclusion of the remarks of Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, he yielded the remainder of his time to Mr. WELLBORN.

Mr. MORRISON. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] will yield to me for that purpose, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. WELLBORN. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced the passage of the following bills; in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (S. 1755) to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians, in Dakota, into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder; and

A bill (S. 1926) to define the boundaries of the collection districts of Miami and Sandusky, in the State of Ohio.

COINAGE OF SILVER DOLLARS.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to present the petition of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York and citizens of said State, including I think nearly all merchants doing a wholesale business in the city of New York, in reference to a bill for the suspension of the coinage of the silver dollar. I present also a memorial of members of the Stock Exchange of the city of New York on the same subject. I ask that both memorials be printed in the RECORD, without the names, and that they be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

There being no objection, the memorials were referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and were ordered to be printed in the RECORD. They are as follows:

SUSPENSION OF THE COINAGE OF THE SILVER DOLLAR.

Memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York and citizens of said State.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

May it please your honorable body:

The Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, and the undersigned, merchants and citizens of said State, beg leave respectfully to represent to your honorable body:

First. That it is desirable that the metallic money of the United States should consist of gold and silver coin of interchangeable relative value, and that coinage should be restricted to the needs of commerce and the wants of the people.

Second. That the amount of silver dollars now accumulated in the Government vaults is largely in excess of these requirements, and that it has been demonstrated by experience that this excess can not be utilized at present as a circulating medium.

Your memorialists therefore respectfully pray that a bill may be speedily enacted by your honorable body which shall provide that the coinage of silver dollars shall be suspended for a period of at least two years next ensuing, and that in order to bring into gradual circulation the surplus silver coin now in the Treasury, the further issue of bills of the denomination of one and two dollars shall be discontinued.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

MARCH, 1884.

Memorial of the Stock Exchange of the city of New York.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

May it please your honorable body:

The New York Stock Exchange and the undersigned, citizens of the State of New York, beg leave respectfully to represent to your honorable body:

First. That the relative value of gold and silver coins has been so disturbed (the price of silver bullion having declined about 14 per cent. from its former value as measured by gold) that several nations have discontinued the coinage of silver, and are not likely to resume it until an international agreement can be arrived at as to the future coinage relation between these precious metals, based upon the regular production of the mines of the world.

Second. That recognizing that it is of vital importance to the interests of the Government and people of the United States that our gold and silver coins shall be of equal and interchangeable value, we are of opinion that the coinage of silver dollars, now progressing at the rate of $2,000,000 per month, should be suspended and not resumed until an international coinage agreement can be arranged calculated to establish and maintain such legal relation between the two metals; and that such suspension of coinage by this Government is one of the most important conditions precedent to the bringing about of this desirable result.

Third. That there are now on storage in the United States Treasury 126,000,000 of silver dollars, not yet absorbed into the circulation, or likely to be so absorbed unless a way is opened by prohibiting the further issue of legal-tender notes below the denomination of $5.

Fourth. That it is a grave financial error for the United States Government to diminish the amount of gold which has been accumulated under the resumption act to protect its legal-tender notes, by investing it in silver bullion for purpose of coinage into dollars which must be stored and are not wanted for circulation. With foreign exchange at the specie exporting point, such diminution in the amount of gold held by the United States Treasury must tend to impair the confidence of the world in the ability of this Government to continue to pay on demand the more valuable of its coins, which alone can be used to adjust and discharge the balance of foreign exchanges.

Your memorialists therefore respectfully pray that a bill may be speedily enacted by your honorable body which shall provide that the coinage of silver dollars shall be suspended for a period of at least two years next ensuing, and that in order to bring into gradual circulation the surplus silver coin now in the Treasury the further issue of bills of the denomination of $1 and $2 shall be discontinued.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

NEW YORK, March, 1884.

MISSISSIPPI CONTESTED ELECTION.

The Speaker laid before the House records of the chief supervisor of elections for the northern district of Mississippi, district No. 2, the same having been transmitted to the Clerk of the House; which were referred to the Committee on Elections, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CARLETON: Petition of the Soldiers and Sailors' Reunion Association of Southwestern Michigan, asking for the establishment of a branch of the National Soldiers' Home in Michigan—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, resolutions of the committee and department commander of the Grand Army of the Republic of Michigan, of the same purport—to the same committee.

By Mr. CLAY: Papers relating to the claim of W. A. Eastin—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. NUTTING: Petitions of J. D. O'Brion Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Oswego, N. Y., and of Hiram Sherman Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Vermillion, N. Y., relative to pensions, &c.—severally to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. J. J. O'NEILL: Memorial of the Missouri Civil Service Reform Association, relative to the civil service—to the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

Also, petition of the board of directors and members of the Merchants' Exchange of Saint Louis, asking that silver coinage be stopped for two years and the issue of small bills be discontinued—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. RAYMOND: Petition of the Chamber of Commerce and citizens of Grand Forks, Dak., urging the passage of H. R. 4384, relative to Indian reservations in Dakota—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, petition of S. A. Hulburt Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Elk Point, Dak., asking for a quarter-section of land for each honorably discharged soldier and sailor—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, petition of citizens of Dakota, asking for an appropriation for rebate on tobacco tax—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. SCALES: Petition of citizens of North Carolina, for national aid to education—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. SENEY: Resolutions of Captain Horace Robinson Post, No. 135, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Ohio, relative to the relief of Union soldiers—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STRAIT: Memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Saint Paul, Minn., for the improvement of the channel of the Mississippi River opposite West Saint Paul—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE: Resolutions of the Board of Trade of the city of Albany, N. Y., recommending the passage of a bill for the permanent improvement of the Erie Canal, &c.—to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. A. J. WARNER: Petition of George Woolman and others, citizens of Morgan County, Ohio, asking for the restoration of the tariff on wool—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WILLIS: Memorial of the Louisville Board of Trade, for suspension for two years of coinage of silver dollars, &c.—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 17, 1884.

Prayer by Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D., of Washington city.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the Senate to that part of the Journal wherein it is stated that yesterday the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] reported adversely, from the Committee on Military Affairs, the bill (H. R. 3236) for the relief of Ernest H. Wardwell, and it was indefinitely postponed. There was sent to the desk with the report a bill which appears to have been introduced in the House of Representatives but is not in the possession of the Senate. The Chair supposes that an identical bill for the relief of the same person, Senate bill 521, which was referred to that committee, was the one intended to be reported; and if there be no objection the Journal will be corrected to make the report read as being upon Senate bill 521. That order will be entered. If there be no objection the Journal of yesterday's proceedings as amended will be approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the memorial of A. M. Merchant, editor of the Rhode Island Democrat, remonstrating against the passage of the news-copyright bill. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I present two memorials from publishers of newspapers in Wisconsin on the same subject, which I move be referred to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a resolution of Neibling Post, No. 20, Department of Ohio, Grand Army of the Republic, Weston, Ohio, in favor of the adoption of certain recommendations of the committee on pensions of the Grand Army of the Republic in regard to pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONAS presented the petition of J. R. Carroll, of Carrollton, La., praying payment out of the Chinese indemnity fund for his losses by the pillage and destruction of the bark Caldera in 1854, indemnity for which damage was especially claimed by our Government and collected under the treaty with China; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PLATT presented the petition of James W. Cheeney and others, of South Manchester, Conn., and the petition of Emory L. Bates and others, of Fiskdale, Mass., praying that the Patent Office be made an independent department; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. HARRISON presented resolutions adopted by Magnus Bucker Post, No. 234, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, and resolutions adopted by Farragut Post, No. 27, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, in favor of the recommendations of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic in regard to pensions; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented a memorial of citizens of California, remonstrating against the claim of Herrmine Thompson to be allowed to pre-empt a tract of land at Fort Independence, Inyo County, California; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON presented the memorial of W. R. Mead and F. J. Mead, editors and proprietors of the Iowa Plain Dealer, remonstrating against the passage of the news-copyright bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. HAWLEY presented a memorial of Burdick & Sandford and six other manufacturers and inventors, of Albany, N. Y., and a memorial of the Armington and Sims Engine Company, of Providence R. I., protesting against legislation by Congress hostile to the present patent laws; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. INGALLS presented a petition of the T. L. Sutphen Post, No. 41, Grand Army of the Republic, of Evansville, Wis., praying that the recommendation of the national committee of that organization concerning the extension of the arrears-of-pension limit be adopted; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONGER presented resolutions of the board of health of the State of Michigan, in favor of the passage of a bill for the prevention of the introduction of infectious diseases into the United States, and for obtaining information regarding the sanitary condition of foreign ports and places in the United States and information relating to climatic and other causes affecting the public health; which were referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Timothy O. Howe Post, No. 3, Grand Army of the Republic, of New Orleans, relative to further legislation granting pensions to ex-soldiers; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present the petition of George W. Nokes, late private Company A, Seventy-second Regiment Missouri Enrolled Militia, of Nixa, Christian County, Mo., praying to have his name entered on the pension-rolls, and move that it and the accompanying letter addressed to me be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CALL, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1366) for the relief of Mrs. Sarah Elizabeth Holroyd, widow and administratrix of the estate of John Holroyd, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MCMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (S. 2060) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Wisconsin, Chippewa, and Saint Croix Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am also instructed by the same committee to report adversely the bill (S. 693) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Wisconsin, Black, Chippewa, and Saint Croix Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin, and the Fever River, in the State of Illinois, the provisions of the bill being covered by the bill just reported.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MCMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (S. 2061) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Mississippi River, one within the State of Minnesota and one between the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am instructed by the same committee to report adversely the bill (S. 1623) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Mississippi River, one within the State of Minnesota and one between the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin, the subject-matter of the bill being covered by the bill just reported.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CALL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2055) for the relief of Basil Moreland; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 2056) granting an increase of pension to James M. Blades; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2057) granting a pension to Margaret Beymer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2058) recognizing Elias J. Beymer as an enrolling officer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2059) authorizing the appointment of a Missouri river commission, to superintend and carry into execution the plans for the improvement of the navigation of said river from its mouth to its headwaters; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move the reference of this bill to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River and its Tributaries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no committee on the improvement of the Mississippi River and its tributaries under the new rules; it is the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River merely. Does the Senator from Missouri wish to have the bill referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir. I had not noticed the fact that the title of the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River and its Tributaries had been changed under the new rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It appears to be so.

Mr. COCKRELL. It must have been a clerical mistake, then, for I do not think it was the intention that it should be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River.

PROPERTY ASSESSMENTS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be directed to report to the Senate the valuation of the property in the District of Columbia according to the assessments of 1878 and 1883, showing the number of square feet in each square in the city of Washington, and the value of the ground and improvements thereon.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Whereas the Constitution delegates to Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes:" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That it is competent for Congress in the exercise of the power so delegated to provide by law for such regulation of the transportation of commerce among the several States as shall include a system of maximum and minimum rates of charges for the same, for free competition between the limits so fixed, for the prohibition of discriminations of any kind whatever either in favor of or against cities, towns, or other localities, whether the same be competing or non-competing points; for applying the same principle to transportation for individuals, firms, associations, or corporations in all matters relating to commerce among the States; for the preservation and enforcement of the right of shippers to select the lines and parts of lines over which their shipments shall pass, to the end that said commerce may avail itself of the all-rail or part-rail and part-water routes of the country; for the prevention of such pooling arrangements and agreements to refrain from just competition as may tend to impose unreasonable burdens upon said commerce among the States; for the protection of said commerce against unjust exactions based on a class of securities commonly denominated "watered stock," and for the promotion of the true interests of both the corporations employed in such transportation and the people and localities engaged in such commerce by an enforcement of the principles hereinbefore stated, and thereby induce harmony and stability in the affairs of the said corporations, people, and localities.

Mr. WILSON. Early in January I introduced a bill on the subject of interstate commerce based upon the features and principles expressed in this resolution. That bill is before the Committee on Railroads for their consideration. I wish to have the resolution laid upon the table with a view of calling it up at an early day for the purpose of submitting some observations to the Senate upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the resolution will be printed and laid upon the table.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" that order is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under the eighth rule, beginning with Order of Business 233.

Mr. MORRILL. It is rather necessary to have an executive session for a few minutes. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 35 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

SPECIAL ATTORNEYS OF DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair asks leave at this time to lay before the Senate a communication from the Department of Justice. It will be read.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, April 14, 1884.

SIR: In answer to Senate resolution dated January 24, 1884, I have the honor to transmit herewith copies of all papers and data bearing upon the compensation of the special attorneys in the star-route cases.

The letters relating entirely to this matter have been copied in full, and where it has been referred to incidentally in letters embracing other matters I have had extracts made of that which was relevant to this subject.

The compensation for legal services in these cases was first fixed by my predecessor, Mr. MacVeagh, at a consultation with George Bliss, esq., at Long Branch, N. J., in the presence of Mr. James, then Postmaster-General, as you will observe from the letter of Mr. Bliss to Hon. William Lawrence, First Comptroller of the Treasury, dated November 12, 1882.

It seems that at that time Mr. MacVeagh did not think he had authority under the law to enter into a contract binding the Department to pay a specific sum for future services. The fact is, the law does contemplate such contracts, but Mr. MacVeagh, not having the statutes at hand, pleaded his inability under the law as a reason for not entering into a formal agreement. However, they came to a mutual understanding, which was deemed its equivalent.

I did not think the rate thus fixed to be either immoderate or in excess of the fees ordinarily paid in New York to lawyers of active practice. It must be remembered, too, that Mr. Bliss was taken away from home and a prosperous business, and that he was selected because of his peculiar fitness for investigations of this character, having had large experience as United States district attorney in New York city in like examinations.

Had it been originally supposed that the cases would occupy the time they did, probably the rate fixed would not have been asked or given. When, however, the trial was tediously protracted by the policy of the defense the sum total paid for the services of Mr. Bliss did appear excessive, and I accordingly urged that some abatement be made by him, as I did also to the other counsel. Mr. Ker's bills I reduced, and Mr. Merrick made reductions at my request, but Mr. Bliss insisted upon full compliance with the requirements of the original contract, in one instance claiming that it allowed him to charge for argument a sum in excess of $100 per day, which I refused to grant, and on the 4th day of November, 1882, he wrote a letter threatening to withdraw from the case if his account was not paid.

While the cases were in progress I thought it injudicious to insist upon concessions, which would bring about the withdrawal of Mr. Bliss. Besides this, had a new attorney been employed in his place it would have taken him several months to learn the facts and make the necessary preparation, which would have increased rather than diminished the expense, though he were employed at a lower rate.

The compensation of Messrs. Merrick and Ker was fixed by me not extravagantly as I think. The record of the two trials embraces 9,374 pages of closely printed matter; the labor was extreme, and the counsel were engaged continuously for months, and often to a late hour at night. In view of the importance of the cases and the responsibility devolving upon the attorneys for the Government I do not think the amount received by Messrs. Merrick and Ker excessive, or out of proportion to that paid in cases of even less magnitude between private parties.

All of the counsel were necessary. There were at least ten openly acknowledged counsel for the defense in the first trial and eight in the second. Opposed to these were but three for the prosecution. Some of the time of Mr. Bliss was frequently taken up in attendance upon the grand jury and out of court, when the whole labor of the case was thrown upon Mr. Merrick and Mr. Ker, who had to conduct the frequent and vexatious interlocutory contentions over almost irrelevant questions raised only to prolong the trial in pursuance of the policy of the defense. On the 29th of March, 1884, I requested Mr. Bliss to retire; and on the 31st of March, 1884, Mr. Merrick withdrew. I have recently employed Mr. Ker to assist in the prosecution of the Kellogg case, a matter which he had previously prepared and with which he is familiar. His last employment is from March 31, 1884, and is at a compensation to be fixed after the trial, when I can properly judge of the value of his services.

In the first trial of the case against Dorsey et al. I personally appeared in court as often as my other duties would permit, followed the case with care from day to day, and made the closing argument before the court and jury. Two of the defendants were convicted on the first trial, but the irregularity and incongruity of finding the subordinates guilty and failing to convict the organizers and chief conspirators, those who made the whole gain and those who had set on foot the whole scheme to rob the Government, was so manifest, that the verdict was set aside upon the motion of the Government. On the second trial there was an acquittal.

The public men who were involved as defendents in these cases were not on their trials before those juries alone; they were on their trials before the people of the United States, and they were convicted by the common judgment of the whole country. They are not punished by imprisonment, but they had better be in prison than now at large, objects of scorn and aversion.

These prosecutions have not been without their usefulness, either. I have been informed by the Post-Office officials that they have saved the Government in that Department alone $2,000,000 per annum. The effect has been to deter all of the adventurers who throng about the Departments in Washington. The same officials have assured me that before these cases were begun the halls of the Post-Office Department were swarming with these dishonest jobbers. They are there no more. The wholesome terror of these trials has expelled them. The thoroughness of these investigations has made it plain that there is no place so high that it could become a sanctuary for a thief and public robber.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Hon. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,
President of the Senate.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I move that the communication, with the accompanying papers, be printed and lie upon the table, with a view in a few days of further moving to have it referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bankruptcy bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not press the motion at this hour, but will let us have the remaining hour until 2 o'clock for the Calendar under the eighth rule.

Mr. HOAR. The bankruptcy bill is now——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. HOAR. I so understand, but the Senator from Tennessee has been permitted to make an appeal to me, and perhaps I may be permitted to say in one word that the bankruptcy bill has been read through, and nothing remains, so far as I am aware, but to take the question on one or two amendments, one to be offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and one perhaps by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. I understand that the Post-Office appropriation bill is ready and the Committee on Appropriations are desirous to press it. I thought the most convenient way for the Senate would be, as it is now five minutes past 1, to deal with the bankruptcy bill, which has beeen read, for the remaining fifty-five minutes before 2 o'clock.

Mr. HARRIS. It was with exactly the view suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts that I appealed to him not to make the motion now. The hour between now and 2 o'clock is the only time that we can devote to the Calendar under the five-minute rule, and it is only under that rule that we make any progress in proceeding with the Calendar. Supposing that the bankruptcy bill can be disposed of in a very short time after 2 o'clock, I hoped the Senator would not press his motion now.

Mr. HOAR. I will not use the bankruptcy bill to displace the Calendar if any Senator desires to go on with the Calendar under the circumstances, though I understand that at 2 o'clock the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] desires to address the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his motion?

Mr. HOAR. I will withdraw the motion on the request of the Senator from Tennessee.

ARMS FOR SOUTH CAROLINA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first business in order under Rule VIII is Order of Business 233, being the bill (S. 1412) authorizing the Secretary of War to adjust and settle the account for arms between the State of South Carolina and the Government of the United States.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. PLATT. I suppose it is a very ungracious thing to oppose a bill which is going to put some money into the treasury of a State, but I want to say that I can not vote for this bill.

Mr. HARRISON. It does not put any money into the State treasury.

Mr. PLATT. It is suggested by the Senator from Indiana that the bill does not put any money into the treasury of the State of South Carolina. That is true in a certain sense, and in another sense it does. It gives that State arms which otherwise she can not get.

It seems to me that the grounds upon which this legislation is asked are not such as ought to commend it to the Senate. The act of drawing these arms originally in advance of the quota to which the State of South Carolina was entitled was the act of the State. I am not going to discuss the question of the condition of South Carolina at that time, and whether the act of Governor Scott was a proper one, whether it was proper to arm the negroes of South Carolina; but the State of South Carolina came to the General Government and obtained the arms, and it seems to me that the State ought to be bound by the act of its governor, and ought not now to come and ask to have the act of its governor repudiated and other arms issued to the State in lieu of those which were thus obtained.

The arms which were obtained have never been returned by the State of South Carolina to the Government. There is no proposition to return them now to the Government. So the proposition is to keep the arms which the Government issued to the State of South Carolina and to treat it as if the issue had never been made, and of course to obtain further arms for the use of the State.

As I say, I do not care to discuss this matter very much. I feel that it is a bill which I can not vote for, and therefore I desired to express that feeling here and to have my vote recorded against it.

Mr. HAMPTON. Mr. President, I shall not discuss the bill except to bring one or two matters to the consideration of the Senate and to correct the Senator from Connecticut in reference to his statement of there having been no proposition to return the arms. All that the State has now it is very anxious to return, and did make a proposition to return them as far as it could get them and to obtain some proper arms in their place.

But the ground upon which we make this application is that we have a very excellent militia there now, a volunteer force that is being built up all over the State; we take very great pride in it; and it is impossible to arm those troops unless we can get some arms. If the act continues in force which gave the arms to the State for thirty years in advance, it will be seventeen years yet before the State can draw a single arm.

I wish to show to the Senate the amount that those arms have already cost the State, and I do that from official documents collated in 1870 and 1871 by a joint committee of both branches of the Legislature, composed entirely of Republicans. Their testimony is that so great a fraud was perpetrated in the arms that they have cost the State $545,159. The changing of the arms into breech-loaders cost the State over $200,000. There were $250,000 charged, and we do not know how the money was expended. Then the State is charged in the War Department $124,000, making altogether, as I have stated, $545,000.

I do not criticise the action of the War Department in issuing the arms. I do not propose to criticise here the action of the authorities of South Carolina. I do not base our claim upon anything of that sort, but simply upon the ground that arms were issued for thirty years in advance. I do not think myself that the Secretary of War had the authority under the act of 1808 to make so large an issue, but I waive that point, and appeal to the Senate not to make any reclamation for the arms that have been issued, but simply to allow us to draw our quota, which amounts to only $4,000 a year, so that we may have some means of arming our volunteers. Two admirable companies in my own town have written to me, the governor has written to me, to get arms. I have not presented the claim, because I know it is perfectly useless to do it as long as this debt remains charged against the State.

I trust that the Senate will pass the bill. It passed at the last session without one word of objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. PLATT. I should like to have the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, there is an annual appropriation of $200,000 made under the law of 1808 for arming the militia of the United States. This is distributed among the different States of the Union in proportion to their population. It is not denied that in 1869 the State of South Carolina received the arms that are charged against that State. The Senator from South Carolina does not pretend to deny it. They were delivered under a requisition from the governor of that State; they were received by the authorities of the State; they were distributed to the militia of the State; they are in possession of the militia, or the authorities, or the citizens to-day.

The amount was largely in excess of what the State was entitled to receive. We have nothing whatever to do with the question as to whether the Secretary of War did right or did wrong in complying with the requisition. I have only to say that if this bill passes the Senate in doing an act of generosity to the State of South Carolina wrongs every other State in the Union, because the amount that is to be distributed hereafter will be diminished exactly by the amount that is given by the bill to the State of South Carolina.

For one, sir, in the name of the State that I represent, I protest. There has been no ground shown for the action that is proposed by the bill. It is simply an appeal by the Senator from South Carolina to the generosity of the Senate to allow this bill to pass in order that a quota of arms in excess of what the State is entitled to may be granted hereafter.

I can only repeat that if this misguided and mistaken act of generosity passes it is a direct robbery of every other State in the Union.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COKE (when Mr. MAXEY's name was called). My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] has been necessarily called home on business. He was paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES]. This pair has been transferred to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. WILSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 24, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bayard,	Coke,	Harris,	Pugh,
Beck,	Colquitt,	Hawley,	Ransom,

Dolph,	Lamar,	Pendleton,
Fair,	Lapham,	Plumb,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum voting. In pursuance of the rules, the Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and forty-two Senators responded to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-two Senators are present; a quorum is present. The question is, "Shall the bill pass?" on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary again proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND (when the name of Mr. HILL was called). My colleague [Mr. WALKER] is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL].

Mr. MILLER, of California (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

Mr. WILSON (when his name was called). My pair has already been announced.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 30, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—30.

So the bill was passed.

BRANCH SOLDIERS' HOME.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1404) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers in either the States of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, at the end of section 2, to insert:

Provided, That said board of managers may select any Government property suitable for such home, by and with the consent of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HARRISON. As there is no report accompanying the bill, I ask leave simply to say a word in explanation of one or two of its features.

The law regulating national volunteer soldiers' homes at present, as to the classes who may be admitted, reads as follows:

The following persons only shall be entitled to the benefits of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and may be admitted thereto, upon the recommendation of three of the board of managers, namely: All officers and soldiers who served in the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, and the volunteer soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and of the Mexican war, and not provided for by existing laws, who have been or may be disabled by wounds received or sickness contracted in the line of their duty.

The bill, as will be noticed, enlarges the scope of these homes in the fifth section, so that it does not require honorably discharged soldiers to make such proof as under the law would entitle them to a pension in order to be admitted. This change in the law has been recommended by the board. In the report of the board for last year they say:

It was recommended that the benefits of the home be extended to destitute deserving soldiers, unable to earn their living, who could not trace their disabilities to their service, and that sailors who served the United States during the war of secession should be placed upon the same footing of admission to the home as are soldiers and sailors who served in preceding wars.

The Senate noticed as I read section 4832 that the sailors of the late war are not included within the present terms of admission to the home. This provision of the bill I think is in strict line with the recommendations of the present board. I think the general sentiment would be that in providing homes for those who are disabled and who rendered valuable and honorable and gallant service we should not make the conditions as close as they are made in the granting of a pension for disability incurred in the service.

I make this explanation simply.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

SEC. 6. That the board of managers of the Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers is hereby authorized to establish a branch of the home in the State of California for the Pacific coast, and to that end the said board is authorized to negotiate with the managers of the Veterans' Home, located in Napa County, California for the transfer of the buildings, grounds, and property of said Veterans' Home to the United States for use as a branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and to accept the same, if in the opinion of the said board of managers it is expedient so to do, upon the terms and conditions offered by the managers of said Veterans' Home.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I desire to explain the reason why I offer this amendment.

There are a great many disabled veteran soldiers, not only of the war of the rebellion but of the Mexican war, on the Pacific coast. In California there are several thousand veterans, some of them disabled; at least we have our share of this class of deserving soldiers. The Government has never established any home or any branch of the National Home on that coast. The people themselves have established what they call a Veterans' Home, and have about fifty thousand thousand dollars' worth of property, consisting of lands and buildings, which they are willing to turn over to the Government to be used as a branch of the National Home.

I offer this amendment to enable the managers to ascertain whether the Veteran's Home in California can be had for this use. It will of course cost the Government nothing and will provide the means of taking care of the disabled soldiers on that coast. It is so far away that they have no benefit of the National Home or any of its branches on this side of the Rocky Mountains. It is manifestly just and proper that they should have these benefits. I know of no other way than to establish a home there; and as a beginning for it liberal subscriptions have been made; the property is owned and is free of debt. I think it would be a good arrangement to have the property turned over to the United States, and a branch of the National Home established there.

Mr. HARRISON. I think I ought to say on behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs that we can not consent to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California. There were several bills providing for the location of soldiers' homes, one distinctly in the State of Kansas, one perhaps in some other Western State. This has been the result. We have provided for one home west of the Mississippi River, and for the reason that none of the present national homes are convenient to these States. It may be that when this measure of the Senator from California can be considered by the committee and the present character of the establishment they have there and the terms on which it may be transferred to the United States can be considered, the committee would be willing to provide for the establishment of a home in California, but I do not think it ought to be admitted as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California is not entitled to speak again without unanimous consent.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I ask unanimous consent to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from California proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It should have occurred to the committee when they were devising a proposition to establish another branch home west of the Mississippi that there was such a country as the Pacific coast, and that there were soldiers there; but as it has not occurred to the committee that there is any such thing needed on the Pacific coast, and they desire to consider the propriety of establishing a branch there, I am willing that the amendment be so modified that the managers may report to Congress before any action is taken as to the merger of the Veterans' Home in California into the National Home as a branch. I ask the Secretary to make that change in the amendment, so that the managers shall report to Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California modifies his amendment. It will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment as modified, as follows:

SEC. 6. That the board of managers of the Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers is hereby authorized to establish a branch of the home in the State of California for the Pacific coast, and to that end the said board is authorized to negotiate with the managers of the Veterans' Home, located in Napa County, California, for the transfer of the buildings, grounds, and property of said Veterans' Home to the United States for use as a branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and report to Congress in respect to the propriety and expediency of accepting said Veterans' Home for said branch.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope this amendment will not be agreed to. It is not just or proper that the Senate should in the first instance take up and consider an amendment of this character. The Committee on Military Affairs gave due consideration to this subject in regard to the bill that is now before us. There were other propositions pending before the committee. There were several petitions from the State of Michigan. There was a project from the State of Pennsylvania, offering a very considerable tract of land and valuable improvements for the location of a soldiers' home. There was a petition from Kansas, a numerously signed petition from Kansas representing many times more soldiers than would be represented by this establishment, asking for the establishment of a home in that State. The Committee on Military Affairs considered the situation. There is already a home at Hampton, Va., called the southern branch; there is one at Togus, Me., called the eastern branch; there is one at Dayton, Ohio, called the central branch; and one at Milwaukee, Wis., called the northwestern branch. We determined to fix a home west of the Mississippi River to accommodate that locality, and we thought it was as far as we ought to go now.

This question has not received consideration, and I do not think that it ought to be adopted at this time. If it is adopted I say very frankly that I shall feel it to be my duty to move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, because if this is to go in there are other equally or more meritorious cases that ought also to be included. If this is to be an omnibus bill to provide for every State, let us understand it and make such provision as best we may.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, there were presented to the Committee on Military Affairs a large number of petitions, representing almost the entire body of the Michigan soldiers of the late war, asking for a branch of the Soldiers' Home in Michigan, and the committee for the reasons stated by the Senator from Missouri did not see fit to make any recommendation in that respect. I had not expected that this bill would be acted on until the petitioners from my own State had been heard fully upon this subject and an opportunity of a more full consideration of the subject given.

I am in favor of this proposition. I think it is a mockery to soldiers who live perhaps surrounded by some relatives, at least by some friends, in places remote from a soldiers' home, to say to them that they can find by going a thousand miles off a home among strangers, entirely away from all those who might be personally interested in their welfare. I believe that it would be no more expensive to have these branches of the Soldiers' Home under the same administration and at reasonably near places to great bodies of soldiers than to have them all congregated in this general mass where in some places there is not room for the soldiers to be accommodated now.

There are many reasons why there should be branches for these old, worn-out, dying soldiers, that they may not go entirely away from all their associations and all their friends, and they should be located where they can have a pleasant home in which to live and in which to die.

I should hope that this bill might be recommitted to the committee with the object of having the committee consider this question of expense, of convenience, and of what is due to the soldiers.

In the State of Michigan there is a military reservation a few miles from Detroit, the old Fort Dearborn reservation, which has upon it all the buildings which were at the fort when it was occupied as an arsenal and a fort. Perhaps with some repairs some of those buildings might be made available for a soldiers' home. At least the Government has the property there, several hundred acres of land I believe, in a salubrious region, and the expense could not be great of fitting it up and preparing it as a suitable home for the soldiers in Michigan who do not like to go off into other States, who do not like to go away from their friends, their families, their relatives, to be away in sickness and perhaps in death, so far removed as they would be by going to Dayton or across the lake to Milwaukee. There should be at least asylums for the sick and disabled and those who can not be moved to great distances. There should be a branch home on a smaller scale for that class of soldiers, and I say it is the universal desire of every soldier in Michigan who was connected with the service in the war, and it has been expressed in the resolutions of the Grand Army posts all over that State, and individually, that there should be a branch home in Michigan for their comrades, in which they may live and in which they may be reasonably near those who are interested in them, that they may die in their own land and in their own homes.

There is no sentimentality about this. There is no reason why men should be sent far off. We are not doing them a favor if we give them a home that has not all the virtues of a home, one of which is nearness to their relatives and nearness to their friends. We should give it to them in their own State, especially for those who are sick and unable to be removed a great distance away from their friends.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs with a view to its further consideration——

Mr. HARRISON, I object to the reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say upon that motion, as I had not quite time enough to say what I wanted on the last motion, that papers are being prepared now which are intended to be presented to that committee, which are before committees in the House now, papers providing for the occupation and use of a military property, a post in Michigan, similar to the one which the Senator from California has presented, in which without great expense, on property now belonging to the Government, military property which perhaps has some conveniences already upon it, at comparatively slight expense other conveniences can be made and buildings erected for the accommodation of Michigan soldiers.

I hope this bill may be recommitted and that the committee will be willing to listen to the voice of the thousands of soldiers in Michigan who have modestly expressed their strong desire for the establishment of such a home.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 2, nays 38; as follows:

YEAS—2.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from California as modified.

Mr. LOGAN. The amendment has been further modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has been further modified, and will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the board of managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers is hereby authorized to inquire into the expediency of establishing a branch of the home in the State of California for the Pacific coast, and to that end the said board is authorized to receive proposals from the managers of the Veterans' Home, located in Napa County, California, for the transfer of the buildings, grounds, and property of said Veterans' Home to the United States for use as a branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and report to Congress in respect to the propriety and expediency of accepting said Veterans' Home for such branch. But this section shall not interfere with the establishing of the home provided for in this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment as modified. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, and it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent to finish the consideration of this bill. It will take but a moment, and I hope the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] who has charge of the regular order will yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the Senate continue the consideration of the Soldiers' Home bill last under consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. HOAR. I understand this is not debatable, but I desire to say that I understand the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] gave notice some days ago of a desire to submit some remarks to the Senate at this hour. I suppose the Senate will consent to that when the request is made, and I hope that the Senate will consent to finish the bankruptcy bill this afternoon after the remarks of the Senator from Oregon. The bill has been read entirely through. So far as I know there is to be no delay except in proposing one or two amendments. Whatever time is taken I hope the Senate will devote to it.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] having charge of the Post-Office appropriation bill expected to call it up at 2 o'clock to-day. He is momentarily absent, and I suggest that this matter can go on until he returns.

Mr. HARRISON. We can finish this bill in a few minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the further consideration of the Soldiers' Home bill, the unfinished business being laid aside informally for that purpose? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask if the Senator from Oregon desires now to proceed with his remarks? If he does I shall have to object, because it is always courtesy to allow a Senator to speak when he wishes.

Mr. HARRISON. I am sure the Senator from Oregon will yield for a few moments.

Mr. SLATER. I shall not object to continuing the Soldiers' Home bill if it will take but a short time, as I understand it will.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana. The unfinished business is laid aside informally, and the Soldiers' Home bill is before the Senate. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER] as last modified.

Mr. HARRISON. In the form in which the amendment is proposed now, being a mere proposition of inquiry, I do not feel for one like making any opposition to it.

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 33, noes 7.

Mr. CONGER. I offer the following to be added to the amendment just adopted.

And also that the board of managers of the Soldiers' Home be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a branch soldiers' home in the State of Michigan, and also as to the use of the Fort Dearborn military reservation and the buildings thereon for that purpose, and to report to Congress thereon at an early day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Michigan that a provision be added to his amendment that this examination shall not interfere with the establishment of the home provided for in the bill.

Mr. CONGER. It can not interfere with it.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois that that provision in the amendment of the Senator from California be put in at the end of the section, so as to cover both inquiries.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. Then let it apply to both.

Mr. CONGER. Let both amendments in regard to inquiry be put in at the end of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I venture to suggest to the Senator from Michigan that instead of saying "they report at an early day," he say, "report to Congress." "At an early day" seems to imply that they should start perhaps next week and make this investigation. I think it will be enough to say, "report to Congress," so as to give reasonable time.

Mr. CONGER. I can not see any objection to their being instructed to report to Congress at an early day.

Mr. ALLISON. There seems to be an implication in the word "early" as if there was great haste about this special matter. I am not particular about it, however.

Mr. CONGER. I think it is as well as it is.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. HARRISON. Was the modification suggested to the proviso that these two inquiries should not interfere with the general effect of the bill carried out by transposing it so as to apply to both?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was not.

Mr. HARRISON. That suggestion was made by the Senator from Illinois. I move that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate agreed to the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER], and the Chair has no power to change it. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] now moves to amend the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole in the manner which he will state.

Mr. HARRISON. I was only calling attention to an amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois, and I ask him to state it.

Mr. LOGAN. It is that the section added as an amendment shall not interfere with the establishment of the home as provided for in this act. It is already in the amendment of the Senator from California.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves to amend the amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole on motion of the Senator from Maine by adding thereto—

But this provision shall not interfere with the establishing of the home provided for in this act.

Mr. CONGER. I think that is overcautious. I do not see how the section as adopted can possibly interfere with the establishment of the home already provided for in the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. It does not hurt.

Mr. HARRIS. Does that apply to the California as well as the Michigan amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That clause was contained in the California amendment as offered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now let the two provisions be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from California will be read, as well as that proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment adopted as section 6.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois to the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendments was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole as amended.

The amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. SLATER. I now ask that the regular order of business be laid aside informally that I may call up the bill I introduced on Monday last.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the pending order be laid aside informally, and that the Senate take up for consideration the bill (S. 2036) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes. Is there objection to the proposition of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is before the Senate.

Mr. SLATER. Mr. President, there is hardly any question which is at this time attracting more attention among the masses of the people than the forfeiture and restoration to the public domain of the unearned land grants so improvidently made by Congress in former years. In certain classes and in many localities this question offorfeiture is paramount and overshadows and obscures all others. And it is quite natural that it should be so. It is only too apparent that within the past decade the area of public lands available for settlement is rapidly diminishing, and just in proportion as the public lands suitable for settlement diminish the improvident and wasteful prodigality of the bestowal of so many millions of acres of public lands upon great and grasping corporations is made apparent. By this improvident bestowal of the public lands upon corporations they have been tied up and monopolized by being placed beyond the easy reach of the pioneers in search of homes for themselves and children.

It is not a question of revenue to the Government; that is not needed. It is a question of homes for the people; and just in proportion as the Government has bestowed the public lands upon corporations in that ratio it has violated its trust and restricted the people in their just opportunities and facilities of acquiring homes and land. In these two things, homes and land for the people, is largely bound up the welfare of the country in the future. Any policy that places needless restrictions or obstacles in the way of the people acquiring land for homes from the public domain strikes the best interests of the country in a most vital part.

It was a most unfortunate mistake for the best interest of the people, whose circumstances and lot in life make them seekers of homes upon the public domain, when the Government was lured into the policy of making extensive grants of land to corporations to aid in the construction of railroads. To many this policy has proved an unmixed evil. Thousands upon thousands have been robbed of years of toil and the homes they sought to secure for themselves and children. It has been the fruitful source of litigation between the corporations and the settlers, and has led to bitterness and popular discontent widespread and deep-seated.

I do not undervalue the necessity and importance of railroads, nor do I overlook the fact that in many instances where grants were given some sort of governmental aid was necessary to secure an early construction of these roads, and that an early construction of some of these roads was necessary not only as a means of opening the country to settlement, but also necessary in a governmental point of view to enable the Government to subdue Indian tribes and give ample protection to the frontier settlements, and also to bring remote sections of the country into more ready communication with older centers of population and business.

But I repeat, it was most unfortunate that the aid devised should have been the granting of vast and valuable tracts of the public domain, the patrimony of the people, whereby the home-seekers have been placed at the mercy of these soulless corporations and compelled to pay exorbitant prices for lands in a new country.

By a late report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office it appears that there have been certified to States and corporations 48,745,941 acres, which were granted in aid of railroads, wagon-roads, and canals. These lands, so far as sold, have averaged about $5 per acre, or double the price at which the adjacent sections of Government lands were sold, or four times the minimum price of Government land, and to the extent of this difference the home-seekers have been compelled to pay of their limited means into the coffers of these corporations.

Mr. President, the growth, progress, and development of the United States in the century of its existence since the close of the Revolutionary struggle is the most remarkable instance of the growth, development, and progress of any people in ancient or modern times. And if we search for the cause of this marvelous growth and development and to which it may be most directly referable we shall find that next to our free institutions our public-land policy has contributed most to these great and astonishing results.

As a part of the results of the Revolutionary struggle the new nationality came to the possession of a vast domain of the most fertile lands. In the progress of events, as we followed the lead of our manifest destiny, still larger acquisitions followed in the purchase of Louisiana, and later by further acquisitions from Mexico. Upon these lands it early became the policy of the Government to invite settlement upon the most liberal terms and conditions; so that all who desired could, if they had the energy and pluck, acquire a home and land in their own right.

As time ran on the policy of the Government grew more and more liberal, and the land laws were steadily improved and liberalized in the interest of the settler until that policy developed into its crowning act, the homestead law, the wisest and most beneficent of them all. Under this policy our people became the holders of land in limited quantities, planted as it were in the soil; the wisest and safest condition for any people, the one condition most conducive to the perpetuity of free institutions.

As a result of this policy the last census discloses that in 1880 there were 4,008,907 farms in the United States, averaging 134 acres to the farm; that of this number of farms 74 per cent., or 2,984,306, were cultivated by the owners thereof, and 26 per cent., or 1,024,601 farms, were cultivated by tenants. The total number of acres of improved lands embraced in farms was 284,771,042. The average number of acres of improved land in each farm was 71 acres, and of unimproved land 62.7 acres. The total of improved and unimproved lands embraced in farms was 536,081,835 acres. There were employed on these farms 7,620,493 persons, or 44.1 per cent. of all occupations in the United States.

For seventy-eight years, counting from the close of the Revolution, the public lands of the United States were regarded as a sacred trust, and were administered by the General Government, no matter what party for the time being held the reins of administration, as a trust, with a jealous care for the interests of the people who were ultimately to make homes thereon. It is true, sir, they were not given as homesteads to settlers, but they were placed within the easy reach of all on such terms as all could readily comply with and by complying acquire land and homes. During that period not one acre was ever given to a corporation for any purpose.

The new States which were carved out of the public domain were aided by grants of land to assist them in making internal improvements, but these grants were to be administered by the respective States to which they were made, and each State had the power to control the final disposition of the lands granted in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as they might think best, not inconsistent with the original grant, and it was fully and fairly assumed that these grants would be so administered as to prevent injury to the people of the State seeking homes upon these granted lands. These grants were very restricted in amount, not exceeding in any case more than the alternate sections for six sections in width upon either side of the road to be constructed. The entire concessions of land to the States from the commencement of the Government to March 4, 1861, for railroads and canals amounted, all told, to 31,600,846 acres.

In 1861 there came a change in the administration of the country. The Democratic party was driven from power and its place taken by the Republican party. The causes leading up to this change of party administration I need not discuss now, but among the charges that were brought against the Democracy was one that the Democracy had fostered corruption and extravagance in the administration of the Government and had squandered the patrimony of the people by extravagant grants of the public lands for internal improvements in the several States. One of the earliest resolves of the Republican party was as follows:

Resolved, That the public lands of the United States belong to the people and should not be sold to individuals nor granted to corporations, but should be held as a sacred trust for the benefit of the people and should be granted in limited quantities, free of cost, to landless settlers.

Among the public acts of Congress passed soon after the accession of the Republican party to political power was the homestead law, for which that party never fails to take to itself great credit, taking to itself exclusively the honor of having by the passage of this law given to every one who will avail himself of it one hundred and sixty acres of land without money and without price; and yet, Mr. President, the idea of a general homestead law was of Democratic parentage. Homestead bills had been advocated in prior Congresses, but the act was finally pressed to a passage May 20, 1862, in the second year of Republican ascendency. I am not disposed to belittle the part the Republican party performed in the enactment of this law, for it is the only redeeming spot in all its acts and doings in the administration of the public lands, that I know of, in the record of that party since it came into the control of the Federal administration.

Why, sir, within about forty days of the passage of this homestead law, for which that party has so often congratulated the country and glorified itself, this same party, upon whom rested the assurance given to the country in the most solemn form that the public lands should be "sacredly held and administered as a trust for the sole benefit of the people, not to be sold for money or granted to corporations, but granted in limited quantities free of cost to landless settlers," granted by act of Congress to corporations 28,442,766 acres of the public lands. These concessions were made in one day, the 1st day of July, 1862, and in less than three years from that date the concessions made by that party, having the control of Congress, to corporations alone, exceeded 80,000,000 acres, including the 28,000,000 granted on July 1, 1862.

Thus in the first four years' lease of power the Republican administration granted to corporations alone almost three times as much of the public lands as had been granted to the several States to aid them in internal improvement during the previous seventy-five years' existence of the Government. But the mismanagement of the public lands did not stop with its first term of four years, but continued up to about the time when the Democracy regained control in the other branch of Congress in 1875. I find, Mr. President, a table in a speech delivered in the last Congress in the House by Hon. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN, of Indiana, showing the concessions of public lands to aid in the construction of railroads and for other purposes granted between the 4th of March, 1861, and June 30, 1874, which I believe to be approximately correct. It is as follows:

Statement exhibiting land concessions by acts of Congress to corporations for railroad, canal, and military wagon-road purposes from March 4, 1861, to June 30, 1874.

Grants to railroad corporations	190,030,064.52
Grants for roads and canals	3,112,543.00

From this table it will be seen that these concessions made in a little less than fourteen years amounted to 193,142,607 acres; and of this amount more than 160,000,000 acres were given outright to corporations, which have always been and are to-day the main support of the Republican party in all its political campaigns. And yet, sir, at each succeeding election, Congressional and other elections, the Republican party has held up to the people as one of the chief reasons why it should have a vote of confidence in the election of its candidates that it had secured the passage of the homestead laws, while it had by these grants put vast tracts of the public lands beyond the reach of the operation of these same homestead laws, and continued to make further grants after each election until there came a change in the other branch of Congress by the return of a Democratic majority, since which time no further grants have been made and none have been increased or extended.

These concessions have been the fruitful source of scandals in and out of Congress; they have brought distrust upon every department of the Government charged with the administration of the land laws of the country. So great has this distrust come to be that among the people who have been seeking homes upon public lands it is boldly asserted that the influence of the railroad corporations dominate and control the rulings of the Land Department; and it is to the shame and discredit of the country that the accusation is too well sustained by facts which are not to be denied. The rulings of that Department have been so vacillating, so often changed, modified, or reversed, and so often made in the face of well-recognized principles of law as to suggest gross incompetency, or, what is worse, corruption and collusion.

The settled principles of law which require public grants to be most strictly construed against the grantee have been notoriously ignored in the construction given these grants by the Land Department, as is shown by numerous decisions. J. W. Le Barnes, one of the law clerks of the General Land Office, in his evidence before the Senate Committee on Public Lands in the Forty-seventh Congress, testifies as follows:

Q. Have the laws generally been literally construed in favor of the railroads?

A. Yes, sir. The principle of law applicable to public grants—that they ought to be construed strictly against the grantees—has not been observed, although the exceptions to the grant are very strictly ruled against.

Q. That is to say, that the grants have been construed very liberally to the grantee and against the settler?

A. Yes, sir.

In another part of his testimony this witness says, in speaking of the class of cases which come before the law clerks for their examination, as follows:

Q. Are these questions that go before you for adjudication such as are not satisfactory to the corporations interested in them?

A. It is the other way. The cases in which the decisions that have been made are satisfactory to the corporations are the ones that usually come before the law clerks' division.

Q. How is that?

A. In reviewing the office decisions the cases that may be thought to have been erroneously decided according to the views of the law division are usually those where the decisions are favorable to the corporations. It is not usual to make mistakes in favor of the settlers.

Q. It is in the revision of this class of work and the detection of what seems to you to be injustice toward settlers that the questions arise?

A. Yes, sir; and in the same way where the interests of the United Sates are concerned.

And in speaking of the way in which contests between settlers and these corporations are brought up, heard, and determined, and before whom determined, this witness says:

Q. Before what tribunal, or what class of minds, are these questions heard in the first instance?

A. Before the clerks having that matter in charge.

Q. Before ordinary clerks?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do these counsel have access informally to these clerks in private conversation and otherwise, and endeavor to press their views upon these clerks with such means as they see fit to exercise upon them?

A. I think it has usually been the fact that the views of railroad attorneys and their constructions of the law have been fully impressed upon the minds of clerks acting upon cases in which the corporations are interested. The regulations prohibit conferences between attorneys and clerks except upon permission. Such regulations have not always proved effective, although they are now more strictly enforced than formerly. Attorneys have, however, full access to chiefs of division.

In his next answer this witness further says:

There are no formal hearings. The pressure brought upon clerks is the pressure of the power and influence of great corporations. If a case involving railroad interests adverse to a settler's right or to the public interest happens to come to the attention of the Commissioner before final decision the attorneys usually find it out and interview the Commissioner on the subject. They also look very closely after cases that may in the same manner come before the law clerk for his opinion.

From these statements of this witness it appears too plainly to be doubted that the rulings and constructions of the Land Department as between the land-grant corporations and settlers has been steadily and almost uniformly in the direction of enlarging the rights of these corporations by ignoring the settled principles of law that public grants ought to be strictly construed against the grantee and giving these grants the most liberal construction in favor of the railroads, and at the same time restricting by construction the exceptions and limitations contained in these grants to the narrowest limits possible. It is a little remarkable, Mr. President, that most of the mistakes in the rulings of the subordinate clerks of the Department are made against the settler. The witness says "it is not usual to make mistakes in favor of settlers." The converse, then, must be true, that it is usual for the subordinate clerks of the Department to make mistakes against the settlers. And this, sir, is just what is charged everywhere where the manner of the adjusting of these grants between railroad corporations and settlers are known and understood. And this is in every locality where these grants have been made and have had an actual existence.

Mr. President, in 1876 Congress passed an act for the purpose of furnishing a remedy for some of the most glaring wrongs suffered by settlers on lieu lands under the rulings of the Land Department, and the witness I have quoted from gives a most interesting account of how this law has been in the main defeated by construction in the interest of the railroads, as follows:

Q. I wish you to state any unjust or inequitable operation of the land laws such as might be remedied by statute, so that the entire system should work justice in different cases where it now works injustice.

A. It is not legislation that is wanted in all cases.

In reply to your general question I could refer to some lines of decisions which have caused injustice to settlers. In the case of Gates vs. California and Oregon Railroad Company it was held by the Secretary in 1878 (5 Copp., 150) that when a pre-emption settler was on land within railroad limits at the date of the attachment of railroad right and afterwards abandoned his claim or transferred his improvements to another the former pre-emption claim did not except the land from the grant, and that the subsequent settler purchasing this former settler's improvements or otherwise occupying the land after the former settler had abandoned it could not have his claim recognized.

The same rule had existed previous to the decision in the Gates case and prior to 1876 and had caused much complaint, as it was of wide application and affected great numbers of cases.

In 1876 Congress attempted to correct this and some other rulings of the Department by positive legislation. The act of April 21 of that year (19 Stat., 35) was a mandatory act, requiring the Department to recognize the validity of subsequent entries where land had been covered by former claims of the date of withdrawal of lands for railroad grants. This act did not have the effect, which was shown by the Senate debates to have been expected by the legislative mind. The Gates decision was rendered without reference to the act of 1876, and was afterward modified upon such fact being shown. But the unmodified decision appears to have been the rule usually followed in the Land Office down to a recent date. The regulations adopted by departmental concurrence or instructions and the rulings made under the act of 1876 had the effect in all cases to make the relief contemplated by that act difficult of availability and in most cases to render the act inoperative.

It was held, for example, that the act could have no prospective effect, because its language implied a past tense. Then it was held that it could have no retroactive effect, because that would be unconstitutional. Again, if a case arose that in the view of the office could be recognized as coming within the provisions of the act, the claim was rejected unless the party was careful to state that he expressly claimed it. A great many cases have been adjudicated in this way, and the parties who had an absolute legal right to their land under the indemnity provisions of the acts granting land for railroad purposes, and had such rights irrespective of the act of 1876, were defeated in their claims under the construction given to an act designed for their protection.

Mr. President, I have made reference to these facts for the purpose of showing some of the evils and abuses that have grown up under these railroad grants; for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that these evils and abuses are not confined to any particular grant, but are the usual and I may say inseparable concomitants of each and all of them. In Congress after Congress for the last twelve or fourteen years petition after petition has been presented here and in the other branch for a redress of these grievances or for relief from some of the oppressions and wrongs which have grown out of these grants, and in the main, sir, these petitions have been unheeded, or at least no adequate relief has been devised.

It is true, sir, we can not undo all that has been done; we can not reclaim all these vast areas of the public domain so improvidently and as I think unwisely given away; we can not interfere with vested rights which have been acquired under the terms of these various grants. But, sir, we may do something in the way of restoring to settlement so much of these grants as have not been earned by the construction of the contemplated roads within the time fixed in the granting acts for their construction or such further time as may have been granted for that purpose. The life of each and all of these grants has long since expired. In fact, sir, by the delay of Congress in not promptly acting in this matter and so legislating that as soon as the time fixed in these grants within which the road contemplated might be completed the lands embraced in the grants should be restored to settlement, the right of Congress to act in that direction has become more and more complicated and embarrassed with difficulty.

By the report of the Secretary of the Interior made to the Senate in answer to its resolution of December 18, 1883, I find that by these delays more than 56,000,000 acres of land are involved in the question as to whether in case of a forfeiture lands earned after the life of the grant and before forfeiture declared can be reached by such an act. Thus, sir, while Congress has stood silent and inactive these 56,000,000 acres have been swept beyond the reach of your boasted homestead laws, and doubtless grasped securely by these great and relentless corporations. And by the same report already referred to I find that the uncompleted portions of these several railroads call for more than 65,000,000 acres of the public lands, all of which is most certainly within the power of Congress to reclaim to the public domain and to settlement. This can be done. These lands can be restored to settlement and brought within the reach of the homestead and other laws respecting the occupancy, sale, and settlement of the public lands. Shall it be done? For myself I have no hesitancy in declaring that every consideration of sound public policy requires that these lands should be declared forfeited and restored to settlement at once. This session of Congress ought not to adjourn until this is done.

Mr. President, the grant to the North Pacific Railroad Company, made July 2, 1864, and subsequent acts and resolutions was by far the most valuable grant ever made to any corporation. It was enormous in extent and covered far more valuable lands than any of the later grants. It embraced vast areas of the best agricultural and grazing lands, large and extensive bodies of coal lands, while extensive portions of the grant are covered with dense forests of the most valuable timber.

This corporation earned in the lifetime of the grant 10,039,459 acres of land, and has earned since the expiration of the life of the grant 29,851,101 acres, and in all 39,890,560 acres, and the uncompleted portion of its road calls for 7,056,640 acres more. The original act contemplated a through line of road from Lake Superior to "Puget Sound, with a branch via the valley of the Columbia River to a point at or near Portland, Oregon."

By the joint resolution of May 31, 1870, the main line was changed to Portland and the branch from some convenient point on the main trunk across the Cascade Mountains to Puget Sound. During the fall of last year connection was made on the main line from its eastern connections to Wallula, in Washington Territory, about two hundred and twenty miles eastward from Portland, and it also completed its line from Portland to the sound, the gap from Wallula to Portland having been filled by the construction of a railroad by the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company without aid from the Government. It is not now pretended that the Northern Pacific even contemplates the construction of a road at any time in the future down the Columbia River. Here, then, are 2,500,000 acres of land about which there can be no question as to the propriety of restoring to the public domain. The road has not been built and never will be. The necessity for it has been fully supplied by the construction of the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company's road from Portland to Wallula; and the necessity having ceased or been removed, the grant should be terminated at once and these lands restored to settlement.

But, sir, it is claimed on behalf of this corporation that the original act making this grant dedicated absolutely all these lands to the purpose of the construction of this road, and that the Government is absolutely estopped from forfeiting an acre of them unless it shall take upon itself to complete both the main line and the branch road. Nay, more, sir; it is claimed by virtue of the resolution of May 31 that under the right to mortgage there given the mortgagee has the right to sell these lands, although the road should never be built. The ninth section of the original act is as follows:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the United States make the several conditioned grants herein, and that the Northern Pacific Railroad Company accept the same, upon the further condition that if the said company make any breach of the conditions hereof, and allow the same to continue for upward of one year, then, in such case, at any time hereafter, the United States, by its Congress, may do any and all acts and things which may be needful and necessary to insure a speedy completion of the said road.

This section is cited by the attorneys and agents of this corporation for the purpose of showing that no right of re-entry was reserved or contemplated in the act, and to negative the plain and unquestioned import of the terms and conditions of the preceding section. But it does not negative either in terms or by implication the force or effect of the conditions of section 8. It adds another condition which the company is to accept, and reserves a right to the Government not found in the preceding section. This further condition is, that if the said company make any breach in the conditions hereof (and these conditions are found in section 8) "and allow the same to continue for upward of one year, then, in such case, at any time hereafter, the United States by its Congress may do any and all acts and things which may be needful and necessary to insure a speedy completion of the said road."

That is to say, if the company failed to commence the work in two years from the approval of the act, or failed to complete fifty miles each year after the second year, and allowed such failure "to continue for upward of one year," then the Governmenl might interpose in the way indicated, although within the time in which the grant was to run, or, if the company failed to complete the entire road in ten years and suffered that failure to continue for a year, the Government could not take advantage of such failure to forfeit the grant or for any other purpose until the full time of one year and more had elapsed. That, sir, is all there is of section 9. The Government assumed no new or additional obligation whatever, and did not surrender the right of re-entry for condition broken, which certainly existed under section 8.

The resolution of May 31, 1870, gave the consent of Congress to the company to issue bonds and mortgage "all its property and rights of property of all kinds and descriptions, real, personal, and mixed, including its franchises as a corporation," which consent had been expressly withheld in the original act. A part, and the principal part, of the property of the company was its grant of land, which though a grant in presenti was based upon conditions to be subsequently performed. The consent to mortgage did not change the character of this grant either in terms or by implication. The company could convey by its mortgage no higher or better title than it possessed, a title subject to be defeated if the conditions upon which it rested were not performed.

The passage of this resolution was simply the exercise of the legislative power reserved in the original act and it must be construed in connection with that act, and so construed as to give each and all of the provisions of both their proper and legitimate force and effect unless there are provisions so different and conflicting that both can not stand. The resolution is not a repealing act and can not be so construed; it is an amendatory act, and as such changed in terms some of the provisions of the original act, restricts some and enlarges others, but in no way changes or modifies the conditions upon which the grant was originally given. To construe the consent given in this resolution to the company to mortgage its property and rights of property into a waiver of a performance of the conditions upon which the grant was made, so as to estop the Government from a re-entry for condition broken, is to import into the resolution terms not found in it and which are negatived by all the circumstances of the case and by every fair and reasonable implication arising upon the resolution when viewed in connection with the original act.

Why, sir, if this construction is to be accepted, then we have the Congress of the United States placed in the position of having put itself and the Government in the position of granting 47,000,000 acres of the public lands in such a loose way that the corporation to which the grant was made had only to execute its mortgage, survey a line so as to locate the grant, go into insolvency, allow the mortgage to be foreclosed and the lands sold without doing a single substantial act toward the construction of the road. Congress has done many foolish acts, but none so absurdly foolish as this. At least, sir, I am unwilling to believe that even a Republican Congress was so blindly stupid as such a construction would imply.

A plea is also put forth that the North Pacific Company has met with reverses, that it has expended vast sums of money in the prosecution of the construction of this road in the face of the greatest difficulties, and therefore the Government ought to be lenient and merciful. In one breath it talks defiance and clutches with an avidity known only to the proverbial grasp of corporations every acre of the 47,000,000 covered in the original grant and tells the Government that it is estopped from re-entry; in the next breath it is suppliant and pleading to be let alone.

Why, Mr. President, no other corporation has been so enriched by Government as this. In round numbers its earned lands amount to 40,000,000 acres, which at a very low estimate will realize to the corporation at least $100,000,000. It has already received over $11,000,000 from the sales of these lands. Its coal lands on the sound, already earned, are stated to be worth an enormous sum. So valuable are they, that the company absolutely refuses to sell them at any price.

A local paper, the Tacoma Ledger, a paper entirely friendly to the company, in speaking of and describing only a portion of these lands, does so as follows:

> In the bituminous coal-field bounded as above described are 1,500 square miles of land—that is, 1,500 of both odd and even numbered sections, or 960,000 acres. As the railroad company owns the odd-numbered sections, it has in this field one-half the above, or 480,000 acres. This, valued at the low rate of $20 per acre, the Government price for coal lands within railroad limits, would amount in value to $9,600,000. We do not think it extravagant to venture the statement that the sum last named underrates the value of the company's coal lands in Western Washington to the extent of representing not more than one-fourth of their real value. Nevertheless, take the Government price for it; and still there is a very important item to add. This belt of coal lands embraces the most heavily timbered region of like extent in the world. Monster fir and cedar trees, many of them from six to nine feet in diameter and from 300 to 400 feet in height, cover the earth so thickly in many parts that standing in their midst the range of vision is confined within a few hundred feet on all sides as by a dense wall of wood. A very low estimate places the measurement of such forests at 60,000 feet to the acre, worth 75 cents per thousand, for this material is extra clear and good. That is $45 per acre, or $21,600,000 for the value of the timber on the railroad company's 480,000 acres of coal lands. Let this be added to the $9,600,000 and we have $31,200,000 as representing the value of coal and timber in and on the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company's coal lands in Western Washington exclusive of the lignite belt.

This estimate is very likely overdrawn, but it can not be doubted that these lands are of very great value even now, and as the country develops will become vastly more so. But, sir, whatever may be the facts as to the hardships and financial disasters and other difficulties this corporation has had to encounter, and whatever may be the facts as to the real value of the lands earned, there is another side of this question that deserves the most thoughtful and careful consideration of Congress, and that is the side of the question that faces toward thousands of settlers already on these lands or who are waiting to go upon them to get homes for themselves.

The company appeals to Congress for leniency. Sir, has it been lenient to the thousands of settlers along the line of its road whose rights have come in conflict with company interests? Let the records of the land offices all along the line of the road and in the General Land Office in this city answer. No, sir; the settler everywhere has been pushed aside and his rights for the most part have been disregarded and overridden in the administration of this grant as in all others. This has been particularly true of settlers on what is known as lieu lands. And here the Department all along has manifested its willingness to serve this company by the manner in which from time to time it has withdrawn these lands in advance of the time when any rights of the company could attach to them, and refused to allow homestead, pre-emption, or other entries to be made upon the odd-numbered sections in the lieu limits; that is, in the ten-mile belt outside of and beyond the limits of the grant in place. These withdrawals were wholly without authority and wholly in the interest of the company, and of course wholly adverse to the rights and interests of the settler. Of course it was one of those mistakes which the witness Le Barnes refers to which are so frequently made in the interest of corporations and against the settler.

In 1869 this company invited settlers to go upon their agricultural lands west of the Missouri River, and promised that each settler who settled on these lands in advance of the construction of the road should be entitled to purchase them at $2.60 per acre. Thousands accepted the proposition and settled on the company lands and improved them. This was particularly the case in the eastern part of Washington Territory and through Montana and Northern Idaho. The past fall and winter, the road having been completed through these sections, the agents of the company began the work of classifying and appraising the lands claimed by the company. The lands upon which settlers had gone and improved and made valuable before the road was built were appraised at from $4.50 to $15 per acre. These same settlers who had taken the company at its word and settled these lands were told by these agents that if they were not ready or willing to come to terms others would be glad to purchase their lands. A very worthy and truthful gentleman, writing to me from Walla Walla under date of February 11, 1884, says:

> The time seems to have come for the great anaconda (Northern Pacific Railroad Company) to draw its deadly coil about the necks of the settlers who have unwittingly placed themselves within its reach. The "indemnity" lands have been selected in this land district and the selections are thrown upon the market at prices ranging from $4.50 to $15 an acre, a price that is distressing to those who are yet under the burdens of opening up this wilderness country. Had the company opened up this country as it was expected it would there would be some foundation for such prices, but as it is it seems to me they are an extortion. On January 1, 1880, the company sent out a circular declaring that the agricultural lands west of the Missouri River would be sold to actual settlers at $2.60 an acre. In view of this many went onto these lands and now have valuable improvements, and now to obtain title to their labors they are compelled to pay these high prices.
> Any one can see at a glance the injustice of this; but what can a man do? Many of us have our fall crops on these lands, and to let them go back and be sold to others is ruin, and to hold on and pay the prices demanded will lay burdens on the people that will retard the development of this country for years. Is there nothing that can be done? * * * We, the people, regret to complain, but what are we and our little ones to do? Here we have settled and are trying to make this wilderness to blossom. But, oh! the burdens are more than we can bear, and must it be so that our own beloved Government can see us thus crushed and not raise its voice against the destroyer, saying, "Thus far shalt thou come and no farther?" Can no compromise be effected that will at least deliver us in part? * * * We do not ask a sweeping forfeiture, but we do think it ought to be cut down and restrictions placed on the price of occupied lands.

Such is the complaint that has come up all along the line of this road in Eastern Washington and Montana. It is the old complaint, that has been made under every one of these grants, and will continue to be heard so long as the lands included in them are being settled. It is proper that I should state in connection with the letter from which I have quoted that recently the North Pacific Company has ordered that all lands settled on prior to some time in 1882 should be sold to the actual settler at $2.60 per acre for one hundred and sixty acres, cash down, or $4 per acre on time. This is to that extent a relaxation for which due credit must be given. But the lands referred to in the letter are lieu lands forty miles and more away from the main line of the road, the Government price of which is $1.25 per acre.

This company is not entitled to leniency; all it can claim is the letter of the law, and that is all Congress ought to allow it to receive. A forfeiture of the unearned lands of its grant ought to be declared at once; and if the 29,851,101 acres which it is claimed have been earned since the life of the grant ended can be reached at all, I would be willing to confirm them to the company upon conditions that all the agricultural lands should be sold to actual settlers only at $2.50 per acre and in quanities of one hundred and sixty acres to each settler. This would be some approach to justice and equity.

But I have been unable to satisfy my mind that these lands are in any sense within the reach of any legislation by Congress for any purpose. That portion of the road to which these lands are adjacent having been received by the President under the provisions of section 4 of the original act granting lands to this company entitles the company to patents, and being so entitled, the fee to these lands has fully and finally vested in the company, beyond the reach of the Government. For this reason I have not sought in the bill to touch these lands, but have provided only for a forfeiture of the lands adjacent to the uncompleted sections of the road. Section 2 provides for saving the rights of persons who have settled or made improvements upon any of these lands with a bona fide intention of purchasing them of the company when earned, by allowing them, if not entitled to enter by homestead or pre-emption, to purchase one hundred and sixty acres at such price as may be fixed—I should say $1.25 per acre; certainly, not more than $2.50 per acre.

The third section provides that all lieu lands selected by the company upon which, at the time of the selection thereof, settlement has been made, the settler shall have the right to purchase the same, or one hundred and sixty acres, at $1.25 per acre, and shall have one year to pay the price thereof. This, sir, is only simple justice. The adjacent lands are sold by the Government at $1.25 per acre, and the company ought to be required to sell at the same price when it selects improved or occupied lands.

Mr. President, in presenting and urging the passage of this bill I am sustained by the sentiment of the State I in part represent and of the Territory of Washington approaching unanimity. In fact, sir, outside of a few towns and the city of Portland the demand for a forfeiture of these unearned lands is well-nigh universal, and it can not be doubted that the opposition to this forfeiture which does exist in that section is largely the reflected opposition of the corporation itself. But whether this be so in fact or not I can not overlook the fact that of the 250,000 people in the State of Oregon largely more than 200,000 are outside of its principal city, Portland, and it certainly is true that the rural population of any State or section are by far the most directly concerned and interested in questions of this character, and ought to have their interests consulted in preference to the special interests of a merely commercial population of one or two cities or towns; for at last, sir, the interest of every city and town is best promoted and advanced by advancing and promoting the interest of the rural populations from which they must derive their own support.

I ask that the bill may be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands if there be no objection.

Mr. DOLPH. A bill has heretofore been introduced by the Senator from Oregon upon the same subject as that covered by this bill, although it is more general in its scope and proposes the repeal of the charter of the company. As that bill is now before the Committee on Public Lands, I presume there is no reason for desiring an immediate reference of this bill, and with the consent of my colleague I ask that it may lie on the table for a few days.

Mr. SLATER. Certainly; I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the bill will lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 6538) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Saint Croix River, in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1372) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. WILSON. I move to add to section 42 the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be held to impair any bona fide lien which may attach to any part of a bankrupt's estate by the provisions of laws of the several States or Territories for work done, labor performed, or materials furnished upon or about said estate, whether the same be perfected or inchoate at the time the title vests in the trustee.

Mr. HOAR. I hope that will be adopted; it makes clear what the bill intends, and what, perhaps, on examination, it seems to me, may not now be sufficiently clearly provided for in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to section 43, in regard to exempted property. I suggested yesterday to him for his consideration whether the exemptions here and the language in regard to them should not be modified somewhat, so that the property which is to be exempted should be made exempt from the inventory and report by more specific language, and whether there should not also be some exemption for immediate use, the exemption of school books, the library, as well as clothing of the family, and an exemption of provisions, as in our State laws.

If I understand this aright—and I do not make any motion in regard to it—this property is to be turned over immediately and the exemptions are to be declared by the court or by some officer afterward, so that everything is to be taken from the possession of the debtor in the first instance except "the necessary and proper wearing apparel of the bankrupt and that of his wife and family; his uniform, arms, and equipment as a soldier in the service, past or present, of the Army of the United States or the militia; such other property as is or may be exempted from attachment, seizure, or levy by the laws of the United States, and such other as was so exempted by the laws of the State in which said bankruptcy proceedings are instituted at the time when the same were begun."

My point is that it may leave it open to the necessity of making the returns and inventory of this property and the order of the court to ascertain what should be redelivered to the debtor.

Mr. HOAR. The suggestion of the Senator from Michigan is a very important one, indeed, and I take some little blame to myself for not having attended to it in the drafting of the bill. The last bankruptcy law provided that the exempted property should not pass to the trustee; that is, the title never passed out of the debtor, for the very purpose of securing what the Senator desires. I see that this section is drawn so that the property does pass and must be returned.

I therefore will move, in consequence of the suggestion made by him last night, to strike out in line 2 of section 43, after the word "section," the words "and shall be set apart by the court of bankruptcy," and to add after line 11, in the same section, the words "said property so exempted shall not pass to the trustee," which will be the provision in the previous bill in substance.

Mr. CONGER. That is satisfactory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 43, line 2, after the word "section," it is proposed to strike out the words "and shall be set apart by the court of bankruptcy;" and in line 11, after the word "begun," to insert "said property so exempted shall not pass to the trustee;" so as to read:

SEC. 43. That there shall be excepted and exempted out of the property mentioned in the preceding section, for the use of the bankrupt, the necessary and proper wearing apparel of the bankrupt and that of his wife and family; his uniform, arms, and equipment as a soldier in the service, past or present, of the Army of the United States or the militia; such other property as is or may be exempted from attachment, seizure, or levy by the laws of the United States, and such other as was so exempted by the laws of the State in which said bankruptcy proceeding are instituted at the time when the same were begun. Said property so exempted shall not pass to the trustee.

Mr. CONGER. Let it read, "Said property so exempted or liable to be exempted."

Mr. HOAR. "Excepted and exempted" is the phrase at the beginning of the section.

Mr. CONGER. I presume that will cover it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to offer an amendment in the line of the one offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], and with a view of perfecting the bill in the line indicated by that amendment. At the end of section 78 I move to add:

That no payment made or security given on a debt due any workman, mechanic, clerk, servant, or laborer for work, labor, or service done for any debtor shall be held an unlawful preference under this act.

I presume there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I do not see how we can provide by law that if a man fails and owes workmen and nobody else, he may have the power of preferring one against the others.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi will be read.

The amendment was read.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will not forget, of course, that any payment made by anybody to anybody, unless it is intended to prefer, to give somebody something which he is not entitled to under this act, is not prohibited by it. It is only a payment with intent to prefer, and the bill has made a liberal exemption, which does not exist in the laws of most States (I do not know that it does in any State now), in favor of debts due to workmen and laborers.

This amendment goes further and provides that you may prefer one laborer or workman at the expense of others; that there shall not be among those meritorious persons a fair division; and that the debtor may make real or pretended payments. I will not say that it provides that he may make a pretended payment, but of course if it were merely colorable, under the Senator's amendment it would not be justified; but he may make preferable payments, so it be that the person preferred is a workman.

Mr. FRYE. Or a clerk.

Mr. HOAR. Or a clerk; his own clerk.

Mr. FRYE. He might pay his clerk $500 which he owes him, and owe a hundred workmen $5 apiece and cheat all of them out of it.

Mr. GEORGE. I deem the amendment which I have offered a very important one, and very essential to the protection of the interests of a large class of our people who are in the main unable to protect themselves through legal proceedings.

I can not understand the force of the objection constantly urged to my propositions of amendment that acccording to the theory of this bill no preferences are to be allowed. I want to change the theory of the bill, if that be its theory, as to this class of persons. We have a right to change it as to them, and I think it is our duty to change it. There is nothing obligatory upon us in passing this measure to make it consistent in all respects, so as to prevent us from doing justice to any portion of the people. In my judgment justice is better than consistency, or than any theory, however ideally perfect.

This amendment proposes to allow the debtor to do what we have already determined that the bankruptcy court shall do to a partial extent; that is, prefer certain persons. We have provided for preferences in this bill to be made by the bankruptcy court, and the sole question is now whether, in exercising our undoubted power and in performing our undoubted duty to prescribe preferences where they are proper, the class of persons indicated in the amendment are entitled to our consideration. I say they are upon every just ground, and that no substantial reason can be given why these parties should not have the preference provided for by the amendment.

In the first place, as I remarked when I first rose, they are a class of persons who are illy able to protect themselves in legal proceedings. In many of the States the court in which the bankruptcy proceedings are administered is at a long distance from the residence of these parties; small sums are due to them, and it will take a visit of a hundred or two hundred miles to secure the payment of these little sums, or it will require the employment of a lawyer, who may in these small cases charge them at least 50 per cent. of the amount to be received.

Again, these laborers are not the parties who have squandered the bankrupt's estate. They have taken no undue advantage of him by engaging him in contracts which have brought him to insolvency, but they have faithfully contributed their muscle, their hard labor, to the enlargement of his estate. They are dependent to a large extent upon the wages which they thus earn for their daily living and support and for the support of their families. In a case of that sort when a man is insolvent, when he has enjoyed the labor and the proceeds of the labor of these men and women, if he is willing, if he sees that in justice and in right these persons are entitled to consideration, this amendment allows him to give to them the little pittance which he owes them and which they have so hardly earned, without turning them over to the delay and cost of bankrupt proceedings.

These laborers ought to have their money. Many of them require it at the end of every week, and will suffer if they do not get it. If the bankrupt is not allowed to make payment, they may not receive their pay for six or eight months, besides being subject to all the costs attendant upon recovering it. I do hope that the Senate will show that much consideration to so large and meritorious a class of the community as to adopt the amendment.

Very little legislation, if any, has ever taken place in this body for the benefit of the class for which this amendment speaks. We grant donations to railroad companies; we grant advantages to banks; we concern ourselves with the great commercial, manufacturing, mining, and navigation interests of the country; but we rarely think of this class, at least if we do think of them we rarely put the thought in the shape of a statute which shall benefit them. They are the most helpless of all, and at the same time I may add the most essential to the prosperity and greatness of the country.

I do hope, sir, that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HOAR. The trouble with the Senator's amendment is that it does not do what he thinks it does, and it does something that he does not think it does. The preference over other classes of creditors of this class is amply secured by the bill already. Now the Senator proposes an amendment which is almost an insult to the laboring classes and not a benefit—an amendment by which men may be enabled to cheat other people. It provides that any preference, no matter whether it is over laborers, over other honest creditors or not, but any preference which a bankrupt debtor chooses to make to a clerk, workman, or laborer, not only for the wages or proceeds of his work or labor but for anything else, shall be protected; so that a bankrupt manufacturer or merchant has nothing to do but to distribute around among his confidential clerks and agents and employés any amount of his estate, and if he can make it appear that there has been something which was a binding debt contracted before that time between him and them, they are preferred against all honest workmen and against everybody else. However, I do not wish to prolong discussion upon the matter.

Mr. GEORGE. The answer of the Senator from Massachusetts will not hold good. In the first place, the amendment only authorizes the payment of valid debts; it does not authorize the payment of sham debts. If the Senator urges that under cover of this provision a fraudulent insolvent debtor in collusion with a fraudulent pretended creditor may make an arrangement by which other creditors will be defeated or defrauded, then that argument stands good against everything to be done under this bill, for in every instance fraud may intervene.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly I will.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose a man fails and owes one hundred workmen $100 apiece, which is a common occurrence in our part of the country, I am sorry to say. There is $10,000. He has but $5,000. Does the Senator think it just that he should pick out fifty of the one hundred and pay them their $100 apiece and leave the other fifty unpaid? Does the Senator think that is just?

Mr. GEORGE. When you get through I will answer.

Mr. HOAR. I have gotten through.

Mr. GEORGE. It is very possible if that is all the estate he has that he ought to divide it out equally among all of them; but I should like to know how the payment of one-half of the creditors, the laborers, there being assets enough left for all the others to be administered by the court, can injure these others, especially if another amendment which I shall offer immediately after this is acted upon shall be adopted. That amendment is to the effect that in the priorities allowed under this bankruptcy act the claims of laborers shall precede the claims of all others, those of the United States, and of the States, and everybody else.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator said that when I got through he would answer my question. Allow me to remind him that he has not answered it. My question was whether, if a man had but $5,000 of assets and he owed one hundred men $100, all laborers, which would be $10,000, the Senator thought it just that he should be permitted to pick out fifty of them and pay them in full and leave the others unpaid? That was the question I put.

Mr. GEORGE. That would not be just, as a matter of course.

Mr. HOAR. That is what the amendment allows.

Mr. GEORGE. But that is an extraordinary and unusual case—the supposition of a man having one hundred laborers and owing them all $100 apiece and paying only one-half of them and having nothing left. He must have something to work on, he must have a factory or a plantation or something on which these men have worked. It is an almost impossible case to conceive that when he becomes insolvent he will not have assets enough to pay all his laborers at least.

Mr. HOAR. Then they all get their pay.

Mr. GEORGE. They might get their pay at the end of the bankrupt proceedings if enough was left to pay them. But that is a mode of argumentation to break down the amendment which is illegitimate. Now the question is whether we are to grant this power to the bankrupt to prefer his laborers; and if the Senator concedes that to be right and believes that in the exercise of this power he will not act fairly as between the laborers themselves, then let him offer an amendment that he shall divide as far as he can among these people pro rata and I will not object to it; but I insist that the great principle of the amendment shall not be broken down by the suggestion of, if not impossible, at least very improbable, contingencies.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. There is another amendment I desire to offer in the interest of the laborers. In section 72 I move to strike out "not exceeding $100," in the fifth subdivision; so as to make the clause read:

Fifth. Wages due any workman, clerk, or servant of the bankrupt for labor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to say in explanation of the amendment that I do not see any justice or equity in limiting the claim of the laborer who has contributed toward the estate of the party to $100. If he ought to be paid he ought to be paid his full debt. He has worked for it; he has earned it; he needs it, his family need it, and there is no justice or equity in limiting him to the sum of $100.

Mr. BAYARD. I think there is a great deal in the amendment to recommend it so far as the question of labor performed is concerned, because it carries with it the idea of that which is essential for the livelihood of the person who performs the labor; but if you allow this sum to be unlimited what is the consequence? The word "servant" might cover almost any employment; and it would certainly be a very well-paid servant who would have more than $100 due him within six months.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to suggest that it would include the service of great manufacturing establishments. I knew one that had $21,000 a year who was merely a servant legally, and he had one day in the week to himself.

Mr. BAYARD. This bankruptcy might approach a time just when this payment was due, and the very value of the assets that were passed into the hands of the assignee for the benefit of all the creditors might be chiefly or in a large measure owing to the labor or the service of the persons whose interests we are now considering. I think if my friend will be satisfied by striking out "$100" and inserting "$1,000" he would reach all that he desires. I comprehend fully that he intends to protect those whose actual labor has been given to make more valuable the property which is set aside for the creditors, and that they who create that property should be paid out of that property, and that actual production in value should have rather more share of the assignment than the ordinary creditor, who probably had nothing to do with producing the value. Therefore I submit to my friend that he will gain votes for his proposition and I think he will reach the object designed if he will move to strike out "hundred" and insert "thousand" there.

Mr. HARRISON. Let me suggest to the Senator from Delaware whether the object would not be better accomplished by striking out any limitation as to the amount of money and leaving in the limitation, which we have already struck out, of six months' time.

Mr. BAYARD. Using the word "salary" or "payment," because the object is to prevent any cover under the name of "servant" for an unlimited amount of payment in full. I think the point is interesting and it ought to be settled.

Mr. HARRISON. Six months would certainly cover all arrearages.

Mr. BAYARD. I think the suggestion is a good one.

Mr. GARLAND. The bill as it now stands is an improvement on the former act. The former act had a limit of six months and of $50. We have now struck out the six months and have put in $100, and I think that is quite liberal enough. If you put it to the amount suggested by the Senator from Delaware, $1,000, you see at once that you break down all hope of an equal distribution in many cases for the payment of the laborers' wages.

It would be very interesting for the Senate to look sometimes to see what different constructions the courts have placed on the sections of the old law in this respect as to who come within the definition of "laborers, clerks, and servants." In view of the construction the courts have placed on these terms we have gone quite far now in striking out the limit of time and limiting the amount to $100 instead of six months and $50, as in the former act.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I should be willing to have the wages of any laboring man, whenever performed and to any amount, exempt; but I should be unwilling to place such a limitation upon the language of this subdivision of the section:

Wages due any workman, clerk, or servant of the bankrupt for labor performed, not exceeding $100.

Under that language the confidential manager of a great manufacturing corporation, or of a railroad, or of any other great commercial enterprise, having a salary far in excess of that paid to members of this body, would be entitled to receive whatever was due him in full as against the claims of other creditors. I do not suppose that the Senator from Mississippi contemplates that.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not.

Mr. INGALLS. I judge that his design is to permit the payment of wages earned by manual labor, and with that understanding I concur. I shall be very glad to support any amendment that will make the wages of a laboring man due from a bankrupt a paramount claim on the estate in full.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator surely would not exclude other than manual labor. Clerical labor is just as hard and just as valuable.

Mr. INGALLS. That is very true; but still the situation is different. Of course all the debts are due in one sense; they all stand on an equal footing. If a man has incurred an obligation he ought to pay it, whether it is for wages or clerk-hire or merchandise.

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, but these debts tend directly to give value to the fund turned over.

Mr. INGALLS. Very true, and the same might be said about merchandise or about any other acquisition belonging to the estate, as money borrowed from a bank. All are just debts and morally ought to be paid in full. I should be unwilling to make any exemption except such as would apply to the wages due to a workman or laborer for manual labor performed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. GEORGE. I am very anxious to have this amendment perfected so that it will receive the approbation of the Senate, so as to secure the laborers and workmen whatever may be due them and for whatever time. I am very willing to adopt the suggestion made by the Senator from Delaware, because I suppose that when the limit is placed at $1,000 very little if any of the wages due to laborers would be lost to them; and yet I find—I did not draw this section of the bill—that the Senator from Kansas thinks that the word "servants" will include the confidential manager or agent or superintendent of a large corporation, whose salary may amount to $5,000 or $10,000 a year. Certainly I do not desire to give such a person an unlimited claim.

Mr. INGALLS. There are many confidential clerks who receive compensation fully as large as that.

Mr. GEORGE. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware will about close out the objections, and so I will modify my amendment by withdrawing the proposition to strike out "not exceeding $100," and move to strike out the word "hundred" and insert "thousand" in lieu thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is so modified. The question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. HOAR. I hope that will not be adopted. It seems to me that the Senator from Delaware will see himself on reflection that giving a thousand dollars apiece, without limit of time, to everybody who comes under the designation of "servant," which includes a confidential clerk, an agent of a mill, and all the clerical service, is going too far. A person who has let his wages remain for more than six months, turned them virtually into a loan to the employer by letting them lay, is not a person who is poor or dependent for support of his family on his wages.

Mr. INGALLS. Suppose that they have been made a loan to the employer for six months because the employer has been unable to pay them in that period?

Mr. HOAR. Still they have been working along so that they have not been dependent for the immediate support of the family on the wages due from the employer, if the thing has been running more than six months, ordinarily. It seems to me that if the sentence should be something like this, "wages due any laboring man employed by the bankrupt," it would not be objectionable. I do not think that clerical servants ordinarily come within the class of persons who ought to be paid first. The clerical service has not created the fund. Usually the fund which pays the debts, which is distributed, comes from the materials, goods, supplies, stock which is furnished by some creditor, and the very property that he has placed on credit to the debtor is distributed among all this class of persons, and that is all the property there is.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator is aware that this is no novel feature. There is scarcely a State in the Union, I suspect, in which upon the settlement of intestate estates there is not protection given for the wages of farm laborers and domestic service.

Mr. HOAR. That I am willing to put in; that is my proposition.

Mr. BAYARD. I know, but this law passes beyond that. It is not simply the settlement of a man's private affairs, but it is his commercial affairs, in which the labor of laboring men and of clerks and other people has been directly bestowed on the estate, and who are not in an independent condition to contract as other creditors are. That is the point, I take it, and that is the meaning of this advantage given to this class of dependent people. They are not in a position to contract voluntarily; they are carried along on their faith in the insolvent, and when the break-up comes they probably have been deprived of their means of subsistence by his struggles to maintain himself for the period of six months prior thereto. I can see that there is an obvious policy in that justice which the world recognizes in favor of the helpless. That is what this amendment is meant for. It is not the open contract with a man upon his credit and ability to pay. It is that kind of contract which is dependent and upon which their labor has been given to make more valuable the property of the bankrupt.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator is debating a principle on which I agree with him. Nobody who has addressed the Senate has failed, neither the Senator from Indiana nor the Senator from Kansas nor the Senator from Mississippi nor myself, thoroughly to concur with all the Senator from Delaware states. What we are trying to get at is to accomplish that without injustice, without phraseology, which will include a large mass of persons who do not at all come within the management of the bankrupt's business. The clause limiting it to six months has already been stricken out without any considerable objection, and the question now is of providing for the class of persons whom the Senator speaks of, and not at the same time letting in business agents and managers who in the case of a large manufacturing or commercial establishment, especially of a corporation, will be the very persons responsible for the failure, men getting large salaries and whose name sometimes is legion. Take the case of a railroad——

Mr. BAYARD. But the amount proposed by the Senator from Mississippi excludes all that class. The sum of a thousand dollars for six months is only a salary of $2,000 a year.

Mr. HOAR. It is not limited to six months. What I propose is to say the laboring men or workmen employed by the bankrupt, a phrase which will cover all the class of persons the Senator has described and will not include clerks or servants.

Mr. GEORGE. I am willing to agree to that as far as I am concerned, but I did not undertake to interfere with the language of the bill on this subject; I adopted the language as presented by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. Now, if the Senator will hear my amendment I think both Senators will agree to it. I am willing to say "wages due to any workmen or laboring men employed by the bankrupt."

Mr. FRYE. Leave out "man."

Mr. BAYARD. And "clerk."

Mr. HOAR. I would not put in "clerk." I think the clerk is generally an intelligent person who is able to look out for himself.

Mr. BAYARD. I confess my sympathies are as strong for him as for any kind of laboring man. The clerks are the worst-worked people I ever knew. They have all the responsibility and very little of the pay.

Mr. GEORGE. Strike out "servant" and leave "clerk."

Mr. HOAR. The word "servant" is the objectionable word.

Mr. GEORGE. Strike out "servant." I am willing to agree to that. I want to protect the laboring man.

Mr. INGALLS. I suppose house-servant was really intended there. That is the language employed in the bill of 1867.

Mr. HOAR. That is what was intended.

Mr. INGALLS. As used in this bill it is too broad.

Mr. GEORGE. Insert the word "domestic" before "servant," as is suggested by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. FRYE. "Laborer" will do it.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, "laborer" will do.

Mr. FRYE. Put it "workman, clerk, or laborer," and you will get it.

Mr. HOAR. Now I ask the Senator from Delaware to listen to this:

Wages due to any workman or laborer employed by the bankrupt, or not exceeding $500 in amount to any clerk so employed.

Mr. GEORGE. The limitation now as to the amount applies only to clerks.

Mr. HOAR. No limitation of workmen or laborers either as to time or amount, and as to clerks it is $500 in amount.

Mr. GEORGE. All right.

Mr. HOAR. I move to strike out the sentence and insert:

Wages due to any workman or laborer employed by the bankrupt, or not exceeding $500 in amount to any clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi withdraw his amendment?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir; I agree to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Now I move to transpose that clause as adopted so as to put it at the head of page 46, and that will also involve the renumbering of the subdivisions of section 72, so that the first shall be second, the second shall be third, the third shall be fourth, and so on. The object of this amendment is to give the wages due these laboring men priority over all other claims or demands whatever due to any person or the Government. We prefer them now to every individual. We only put the United States Government and the State governments ahead of them. I insist that it is not a very nice thing for the Government of the United States, rich and powerful, with an overflowing Treasury, with an unlimited power of taxation, in a race for a division of the bankrupt's little estate to seek to get ahead of his laborers and his workmen. I think it is a small thing for the Government of the United States to enter into a contest with these laborers and actually to set them aside, tell them to go and starve until first the debts and demands of the Government are paid. I hope that there will be no objection to this amendment.

Mr. HOAR. The amendment moved by the Senator from Mississippi requires the laborers to be paid even before the expenses of settling the estate are paid, so that the estate would not be settled at all if these laborers were paid in this way.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a minute?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. The entry fee of $60 has to be paid under the bill before any distribution is made. The party has to make that payment when he files his petition. As I understand the bill it takes that out of the assets and deposits it in the register's office or the commissioner's office or the clerk's office. As to the first clause, the ½ per cent., that is a mere tax levied for the benefit of the Treasury of the United States. So I think the Senator's objection is not a good one.

Mr. HOAR. All the costs and charges of the proceedings, including the entry fee of $60, are provided for in the second clause. The Senator proposes before any costs whatever (it might cost $1,000 to collect the assets) are allowed that these laborers shall first be paid; so that I say he does in his amendment provide that this shall be paid to the laborers before the costs and charges are paid.

In the next place, there is not a State in the Union which does not prefer its own claim for taxes in the case of insolvent estates and in the case of the estates of deceased persons. The Senator's amendment makes class legislation if he provides that there shall be a certain class of persons in this country who shall be excepted from the universal rule of all governments, to wit, that the Government's claim for taxes, which are supposed to be necessary to its preservation, shall be preferred.

I do not want to make a long debate over all these amendments and weary the patience of the Senate. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. GEORGE. As to the position of the Senator from Massachusetts that we are violating a universal rule, I think he is correct. That is the very thing I want to do. I want to break down the universal rule which has prevailed not only in this country but in all governments, as he says, by which the government grabs of an insolvent's estate its share to the exclusion of the laborers who create what little the debtor has. I think we have no right to do such a wrong and injustice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. GARLAND. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to change the order of subdivisions in section 72 so as to make the fifth subdivision the first subdivision.

Mr. GARLAND. The amendment now offered by the Senator from Mississippi is a good one. I say it is good because the Senate has approved an amendment he offered a few moments ago, and this is a logical sequence of that; there is no escaping from it. If we are to give the workmen and the laborers, by whatever name they are designated, by the former amendment of the Senator from Mississippi the great preference that we give them in that amendment, we ought to do the complete job and put them first. I think his amendment is a very logical and natural sequence of the first amendment we adopted, and therefore I shall support it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

The question having been put, there were on a division—ayes 16, noes 16—no quorum voting.

Mr. GEORGE and Mr. INGALLS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK (when his name was called). Upon the bill and all questions connected with it I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is necessarily absent, and not knowing how he would vote upon any of the amendments, I have declined to vote upon any of them.

Mr. MILLER, of New York (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

Mr. PLUMB (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). On the bill and all amendments I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM]. I should vote "yea" if he were here.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 17, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Brown,	Farley,	Jackson,	Slater,
Call,	Garland,	Jonas,	Van Wyck.
Cockrell,	George,	Morgan,
Coke,	Hampton,	Ransom,
Colquitt,	Harris,	Saulsbury,

NAYS—23.

Allison,	Dolph,	Hoar,	Palmer,
Bayard,	Frye,	Ingalls,	Pike,
Blair,	Groome,	McMillan,	Platt,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Hawley,	Miller of Cal.,	Sherman.
Dawes,	Hill,	Mitchell,

ABSENT—36.

Aldrich,	Fair,	Logan,	Riddleberger,
Anthony,	Gibson,	McPherson,	Sabin,
Beck,	Gorman,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Bowen,	Hale,	Maxey,	Vance,
Butler,	Jones of Florida,	Miller of N. Y.,	Vest,
Camden,	Jones of Nevada,	Morrill,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Pa.,	Kenna,	Pendleton,	Walker,
Cullom,	Lamar,	Plumb,	Williams,
Edmunds,	Lapham,	Pugh,	Wilson.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. So as to obviate the objection made by the Senator from Massachusetts I move to insert the subdivision after the second clause, so that it shall be third in the order of priority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. Let us hear where it comes in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to make the fifth subdivision the third, and to renumber the remaining subdivisions to conform thereto.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator from Mississippi state the effect of his amendment?

Mr. GEORGE. The effect of it will be to put servants and laborers third in the order of priority, coming in immediately after the payment of the expenses of the bankruptcy proceedings.

Mr. HOAR. Above State or national taxation?

Mr. INGALLS. Paramount to debts and taxes due to the United States and to the State?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PLUMB (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I was paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM], but I have transferred the pair to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER]. I vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 24, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Allison,	Farley,	Harris,	Palmer,
Blair,	Frye,	Ingalls,	Platt,
Call,	Garland,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Cockrell,	George,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Coke,	Groome,	Miller of Cal.,	Slater,
Conger,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Williams.

NAYS—10.

Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Manderson,	Sherman.
Dawes,	Hill,	Mitchell,
Dolph,	Hoar,	Sawyer,

ABSENT—42.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Logan,	Riddleberger,
Anthony,	Fair,	McMillan,	Sabin,
Bayard,	Gibson,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Beck,	Gorman,	Mahone,	Vance,

Camden,	Jones of Nevada,	Pendleton,	Walker,
Cameron of Pa.,	Kenna,	Pike,	Wilson.
Colquitt,	Lamar,	Plumb,
Cullom,	Lapham,	Pugh,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum voting, the Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and forty-two Senators answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll-call shows that there are forty-two Senators, being a quorum, present. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary again called the roll on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Allison,	Farley,	Hawley,	Palmer,
Blair,	Frye,	Hill,	Platt,
Brown,	Garland,	Ingalls,	Ransom,
Call,	George,	Jackson,	Saulsbury,
Cockrell,	Groome,	Jonas,	Sherman,
Coke,	Hampton,	Logan,	Slater,
Colquitt,	Harris,	Miller of Cal.,	Williams.
Conger,	Harrison,	Morgan,

NAYS—10.

Bayard,	Dolph,	Mitchell,	Sawyer.
Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Morrill,
Dawes,	Manderson,	Pike,

ABSENT—35.

Aldrich,	Fair,	McMillan,	Sabin,
Anthony,	Gibson,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Beck,	Gorman,	Mahone,	Vance,
Bowen,	Hale,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,

Camden,	Jones of Nevada,	Pendleton,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Pa.,	Kenna,	Plumb,	Walker,
Cullom,	Lamar,	Pugh,	Wilson.
Edmunds,	Lapham,	Riddleberger,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the Secretary will change the numbers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Of course the Secretary will note the amendment as it is agreed to and transpose the subdivisions.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not restricted to any particular order in the sections in moving amendments, I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The whole bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. In section 35, line 6, after the word "thereafter," I move to insert:

Before such order shall be granted by said court the judge thereof shall require such creditors to execute a bond, with such sureties as he may direct, conditioned for the payment of all damages and costs which the defendant may sustain in case said petition shall not be maintained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to make an explanation simply. The amendment which I offer restores the bill where it was as reported by the Senator from Massachusetts at the last Congress. It requires a bond to be given before any order putting the party into bankruptcy shall be obtained. That was a provision in the bill introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts at the last Congress, and this is a mere proposition to restore that to the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I am satisfied that the amendment ought not to prevail. It is requiring what is required of no other judicial remedy whatever, the giving of a bond in advance before the facts are heard. Very often the creditors whom fraudulent debtors seek to defraud are persons in humble life, are their own workmen, are persons of small means, and to require a heavy bond before a legal remedy should be allowed is contrary to our entire policy in all similar cases.

Mr. GEORGE. I might ask the Senator from Massachusetts if this provision is not proper why it was incorporated in the bill introduced at the last session and indorsed by him?

Mr. HOAR. It did not have my assent at the time. That portion of the section was drawn by somebody else and inserted in the bill. The Senator, on recurring to the debates of last session, will find that I expressed my objection to it then.

Mr. GEORGE. At all events it received so much of the indorsement of the Senator as was implied by incorporating it in a bill for our consideration which he introduced in the Senate. It is not an unusual provision. There are provisions in the bill as introduced by the Senator and now under consideration which require bonds. I think it is a very important provision. I do not think any man ought to be allowed to commence proceedings of this character, which are so damaging to the fortunes and credit of the defendant, without being sure that he stands on safe ground. He ought not to be allowed to bring merely speculative proceedings.

The mere fact that proceedings of this sort are commenced against a party destroys his credit; it impairs his energies. He can do nothing between the filing of the petition and the hearing of the cause. There may be mistrials, and it may be months before there is a final determination of the petition. It cannot be a hardship on the creditor. He ought to know what he is doing before he charges his debtor with fraud and institutes proceedings against him which will destroy him if successful and will greatly injure him even if it fails. Certainly it is no hardship, and I think it would be a very great omission on the part of the Senate to allow any citizen of this country, any man entitled to the protection of our laws, to be thus molested, and deprive him of a bond of indemnity against an improper and unfounded proceeding.

As is suggested by my friend before me [Mr. COKE], the reason for a bond in this case is much stronger than it is for an attachment bond. An attachment may be sued out against a man and he will be entitled to replevy the property at once. There is no charge of fraud, no implication against his character or standing as a man or as a citizen. I can not see but that the giving of the bond is a very essential and proper safeguard against the improper use of a very dangerous power granted by this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WILSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON]. I do not know how he would vote on this amendment, and I withhold my vote.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 19, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Brown,	Conger,	Hampton,	Ransom,
Call,	Farley,	Harris,	Saulsbury,
Cockrell,	Garland,	Jackson,	Van Wyck,
Colquitt,	George,	Jonas,	Williams.
Coke,	Groome,	Morgan,

NAYS—20.

Allison,	Dolph,	Ingalls,	Morrill,
Bayard,	Frye,	Logan,	Palmer,
Blair,	Harrison,	Manderson,	Platt,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Miller of Cal.,	Sawyer,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Sherman.

ABSENT—37.

Aldrich,	Gibson,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Anthony,	Gorman,	Mahone,	Slater,
Beck,	Hale,	Maxey,	Vance,
Bowen,	Hill,	Miller of N. Y.,	Vest,
Butler,	Jones of Florida,	Pendleton,	Voorhees,
Camden,	Jones of Nevada,	Pike,	Walker,
Cameron of Pa.,	Kenna,	Plumb,	Wilson.
Cullom,	Lamar,	Pugh,
Edmunds,	Lapham,	Riddleberger,
Fair,	McMillan,	Sabin,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. I think it is likely that the amendment I now propose to offer will be agreeable to the Senator from Massachusetts, and I call his attention to it. It seems to me an omission in the bill. In section 26 it is provided—

That at any time before or within three months after the adjudication, upon proof being made by affidavit, to the satisfaction of the judge, that any bankrupt or person against whom proceedings in bankruptcy are pending is about to leave the district, and that his departure will hinder, impair, or delay the proceedings therein, the judge may issue his warrant to the marshal directing him to arrest said bankrupt, or supposed bankrupt.

Mr. HOAR. That section was not reserved.

Mr. GEORGE. In the same section there are provisions for the issue of warrants taking possession of the party's property, and then there is this proviso:

Provided, however, That no warrant or injunction interfering with or restraining the prosecution of the ordinary business of the alleged bankrupt shall issue unless the petitioning creditor execute and file with the clerk of the court a bond to the alleged bankrupt, &c.

The object of my amendment is to extend this provision for the bond to the issuing of the warrant for the arrest of the debtor.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator did not reserve an amendment to that section; but I have no objection for one to going back to it and to making the amendment. I think it is reasonable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stated some half hour since that the whole bill was in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment, not remembering at the moment the unanimous-consent rule under which the Senate was acting.

Mr. HOAR. I hope there will be no objection to this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi will be received. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and the amendment will be read.

Mr. GEORGE. I fear I have lost it.

Mr. HOAR. I will suggest one which will cover it. Put in after the word "bankrupt," in line 25, the words "or requiring the arrest of his person," so as to read:

That no warrant or injunction interfering with or restraining the prosecution of the ordinary business of the alleged bankrupt, or requiring the arrest of his person, shall issue, &c.

Mr. GEORGE. That is it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 26, line 25, after the word "bankrupt," it is proposed to insert "or requiring the arrest of his person."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to section 107. As that section reads it seems to me it is the exercise of an unconstitutional power on the part of Congress:

SEC. 107. That this act shall not repeal or annul the laws of any State in force, or which may be hereafter enacted, in respect of insolvent debtors, except so far as the same may respect persons who are or may be within the purview of this act, and whose debts shall amount in the cases specified in the thirty-first and thirty-third sections thereof to the sums therein mentioned.

The point I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to is this: This section asserts the power of Congress to repeal or annul State legislation, and that, I apprehend, can not be the effect in any case at all. We can pass laws here providing a general and uniform system of bankruptcy, and those laws have their own constitutional effect, to be decided upon by the courts; but Congress can not assume to repeal an act of the Legislature or to annul an act of the Legislature of any State in this Union under any circumstances. I therefore think that the Senator will find it to the advantage of his bill to strike out section 107, inasmuch as it is an unnecessary section. The law has precisely that effect in cases of concurrent powers where the power of the Congress of the United States under the Constitution, when exerted, becomes supreme.

I have stated my point. I presume that the Senate comprehend the statement, and therefore I yield the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that it has been settled that a law of the United States repeals and annuls, so long as it lasts, a State law on the subject of bankruptcy. It acts as a suspension. In the case of the Massachusetts insolvent laws, after the bankrupt law of 1867 passed they were suspended, and instantly revived on the repeal of the United States bankrupt law without any new legislation.

This language was drawn, I think I am not mistaken in affirming, by Chief-Justice Marshall. It was in the bankrupt law of 1800, and I know that some of the old bankruptcy legislation was drawn by him, and I think I am not mistaken in affirming that of this section, though I may possibly be. The effect of it is to show clearly that Congress did not mean to cover the whole ground. It might be claimed in the absence of this section—and that was the reason for putting it into the bill of 1800—that Congress meant to exhaust the subject of legislation for the purpose of distributing among creditors the estates of insolvent persons. There are certain classes of small creditors where it may be desirable still for the States by creditors' bills or by cheap hearings before judges of probate or in some other way to divide the whole property among the creditors.

In my judgment no United States bankrupt law that we have passed ever included railroad corporations, because a railroad is, in my opinion, an instrumentality of the power of the State. It has the power of eminent domain delegated to it to take land for the railroad to build the road, and it performs a great public function in providing a great public way for the people. That was held otherwise in the circuit court of New England by Judge Shepley under the old bankrupt law. This bill has not undertaken to go into that question, but to leave it to the courts to determine. It was intended by this section to declare that it was not to be understood that the States were prohibited from providing for any class of persons or any class of cases that we had not provided for, that were not within the purview of the act. I think on consideration the Senator from Alabama will see that the section had better stand.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts whether a modification of the section might not meet the object of the Senator from Alabama and still retain the section by amending it to this effect: In line 1 of the section strike out the words "repeal or annul" and insert the words "be held to suspend or affect the operation of."

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WILSON. That would seem to me to avoid the force of the criticism of the Senator from Alabama, which is to the assertion of the right to repeal or annul State laws.

Mr. MORGAN. The object of this section of course is to restrain or restrict the effect of this act of Congress.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Iowa prefers the phrase he suggests—it means exactly the same thing—I have no objection.

Mr. WILSON. It seems to me that it might meet the criticism submitted by the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest that no amendment has been offered to the section.

Mr. WILSON. I will move, then, in order to meet the suggestion, to amend section 107 by striking out, in the first line thereof, the words "repeal or annul" and inserting in lieu thereof "be held to suspend or affect the operation of;" so as to read:

That this act shall not be held to suspend or affect the operation of the laws of any State in force, or which may be hereafter enacted, in respect of insolvent debtors, except so far as the same may respect persons who are or may be within the purview of this act, and whose debts shall amount in the cases specified in the thirty-first and thirty-third sections thereof to the sums therein mentioned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. MORGAN. That amendment meets the constitutional objection I raised.

Mr. GARLAND. The suggestion made by the Senator from Alabama as to section 107 presents very singular and very curious questions. I do not think there is any doubt under the decision in the old case of Sturgis vs. Crowninshield that this section can not have any business in the law at all, and I was opposed to it in committee when it was presented. I have before me, however, the opinion in a very singular case of the Supreme Court during this winter, the case of Boese vs. King et al., which came up from the court of appeals of New York, which brought up the alleged conflict between the bankrupt act of 1867, or what was left of it, and the insolvent act of the State of New York. The court, although not in express terms, came very near overruling the old decision of Sturgis vs. Crowninshield. It is true there was a divided court, it standing five to four, there being four dissenting judges in the case. They held that the insolvent act of New York of 1846 permitted the party to sue and take the benefit of the suit notwithstanding the bankrupt act of Congress and the pendency of proceedings under the bankrupt act. That is a very close question and one with the reasoning of the court in which I am not altogether satisfied.

I do not know that the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa meets the real difficulty in the case. The section as it stands is protected by this decision of the Supreme Court which I hold in my hand; but the question comes now whether or not that decision, suppose we accept it as the law, is better law than the decision in Sturgis vs. Crowninshield, which has stood so long in this country as acknowledged and conceded law. I would much prefer for one to stand upon the original proposition of the Senator from Alabama to strike out the section entirely so as to bring no difficulty about it.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, this section was put in when the bill contained the boundary of the jurisdiction of the bankrupt act at $500; that is, when no case under $500 could be brought into the bankruptcy court. That has been changed by the Senate to $300, so that the need of the section is very much less now than when the bill was introduced. I am quite sure I consulted the Senator from Arkansas himself on this particular matter and called it to his attention, and we both supposed that it might be convenient for the States to make some arrangement for distributing small estates themselves.

Mr. GARLAND. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. But on the suggestion of some Senator, against my original judgment, the jurisdiction of the bankrupt law was extended. I think it would be better now to leave estates, even to the amount of a thousand dollars, in the hands of the State Legislatures, because it would be very rare indeed that in so small an estate as that there would be debts due beyond the limits of the State which would require a discharge. But the Senate thought otherwise, and I did not make any great contest over that. I believe I consented to the amendment. That makes the section very much less necessary and important.

Mr. GARLAND. I agree with the Senator in that respect; but still it leaves something for it to operate upon. It was at my own suggestion that the Senate adopted the three-hundred-dollar limit instead of the five-hundred-dollar. But I can see in the position into which the matter is brought by the different conclusions of courts that we are going to have trouble upon this, and I do not think the amendment of the Senator from Iowa removes the difficulty. I believe the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama would do so by striking the entire section out.

Mr. HOAR. Let it go out.

Mr. GARLAND. And leave the matter stand upon the law as it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON. If the purpose is to strike out the section, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to strike out section 107.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to strike out section 107.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I sent an amendment to the desk the other day, which I now offer. On page 21, section 33, line 20, after the word "preferences," I move to insert:

Or shall, after the passage of this act, sell or buy, or agree to sell or buy, for delivery at a future period longer than three days from the date of such sale or purchase, any stocks, bonds, or other securities, or any grain, food, provisions, provender, or cotton, wool, sugar, salt, or tobacco, without such vendor being, at the time of making such contract, the owner, or assignee, or trustee of the property sold, or agreed to be sold, or the authorized agent of such owner, assignee, or trustee.

When a bankruptcy bill was before the Senate at the last session of Congress I had the honor to present an amendment, which was adopted I believe on two separate votes by the Senate, substantially embodying this language. The bill was then recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, and they reported back a substitute for the bill that was under consideration by the Senate at the time this amendment was adopted, and the committee, after having revised the language of my amendment, reported that which I now have read; so that I presume it has been sufficiently well considered in respect of its verbiage, terminology, &c., and that it embodies perhaps in as good form as we can get it the idea that I desire to present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. This proposition has been for some time before the country; the newspaper press have commented upon it very freely and very extensively, and I presume that every Senator here has really considered the subject and made up his mind about it; so that it can scarcely be worth my while to undertake to present arguments in behalf of it this afternoon, unless some Senator shall make it necessary by objection to this being inserted in the bill.

Mr. HOAR. That language I did not make much objection to when it came up in the bill of last winter; the bill did not then pass; but on examination and on reading the discussion all over the country I am satisfied that it ought not to be inserted. I believe it received a nearly unanimous condemnation from the press so far as any press was friendly to the bill itself. As the Senator has got it now any grocer or marketman who should undertake to supply the Senator three days hence with his new stock of potatoes or with a barrel of flour, or a coal-dealer who should undertake to supply him with coal, or a dealer in fuel with wood, would instantly commit an act of bankruptcy, and a person who was worth a million dollars and did not owe a debt in the world would commit an act of bankruptcy by doing this.

The trouble is that this seeks to punish what is undoubtedly an injurious practice, one which it would be very desirable to suppress; that is, gambling in stocks or in property of any kind, making contracts for sales with reference to a future rise or fall. It undertakes to punish that injury to the public interest by declaring it what it is not in fact, an act of bankruptcy, by bringing it into a system where it has no place and to which it has no relation whatever. It would be quite reasonable to provide that if a man being actually insolvent did these things that should be a reason for putting him into bankruptcy, and my impression now is that that is the way it was left last winter on final discussion; that it did not make it an act of bankruptcy in all cases, but only where the man was actually insolvent.

Mr. GEORGE. That is a very good way to make him insolvent.

Mr. HOAR. Now, take Mr.——; no, I will not name him, though the name of an individual came to my lips who has been a candidate for a pretty high place in this country. I will not name any individual; but take a man who is clearly worth $5,000,000 who goes into a stock speculation. This amendment, if I understand it, declares that that person shall be forthwith declared a bankrupt. What are you going to do with him when you declare him a bankrupt? He does not owe any debts or very few debts; he is not insolvent. You put him at the mercy of some person who desires to black-mail him. That is all there is of it.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the language of section 33 is divided out by semicolons down to the first period, and that part of the section covers thirty lines of text. In those thirty lines of text there are included various causes of involuntary bankruptcy. The section sets out with the proposition that a person before he can be put into involuntary bankruptcy must be a trader. No other person can be put into that condition for any delinquency or any failure in business of any kind. He must owe then debts exceeding in amount a thousand dollars, the second condition before you can get him into involuntary bankruptcy. And then if he "departs from the State, District, or Territory of which he is an inhabitant, with intent to defraud his creditors," he may be put in, "or, being absent, remains so with like intent," he may be proceeded against; or if he "conceals himself to avoid arrest or the service of legal process," he may be put in; or makes a "fraudulent transfer of his property; or conceals or removes the same to avoid process; or, with intent to defraud his creditors, procures or suffers judgment against him; or gives a warrant to confess judgment, or judgment-note, with like intent; or who, being actually insolvent, suffers his property to be seized on execution, and fails within twenty days thereafter to redeem the same from such seizure."

The evil intent which is presupposed in the other definitions that precede that is supposed to be absent, and he is put into bankruptcy or made amenable to the proceeding merely because, "being actually insolvent," unable to pay his debts, he "suffers his property to be seized in execution, and fails within twenty days thereafter to redeem the same from such seizure; or has suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper or open accounts, made, passed, or contracted in the course of his business, for a period of thirty days after the same were payable." Those two clauses are divided by a semicolon, and the latter cause of bankruptcy which I have just read does not bear upon his being insolvent at all. There is no dependence in that upon the preceding section.

Now we come to the next clause:

Or, who being insolvent—

Introducing that feature again—

makes a preference to any creditor as hereinafter defined, or makes an assignment for the benefit of existing creditors, with or without preferences.

There the evil to be remedied is that the party being actually insolvent makes a preference among his creditors, or makes an assignment without preference among his creditors, an assignment in that phraseology being construed of course to mean a common or general assignment of all he possesses, but without fraud, without even intent to defraud, without anything of that sort. Now this amendment which I offer follows that semicolon after the word "preferences," and defines an entirely separate and distinct cause of bankruptcy, which is that being indebted to the amount of a thousand dollars and being a trader—for those are the conditions precedent to the whole operation of this involuntary clause—a man shall after the passage of this act sell or buy, or agree to sell or buy for delivery in the future, &c. I think it is entirely competent and entirely proper that in dealing with traders we should give to their creditors the benefit of all the moral protection we can against acts on their part which are destructive of the welfare of traders and of the community also.

The Senator from Massachusetts confesses that here is an evil which ought to be checked, but he thinks a bankrupt bill is perhaps not the proper proceeding in which to make the correction. It seems to me that it is not only proper, but that it is the only one in which we can legislate against this evil.

A man who goes in as a trader upon capital which he represents himself as having and upon that representation obtains credit from various persons in the country, goes to a gambling table, goes to a faro bank and gambles away his money—I do not know why that man should not be as liable to be put into bankruptcy as if he had made some unfortunate speculation and other men had failed to pay him money or he had failed to the extent of being sued to a judgment against him and a return of no property found on his judgment or he has failed to redeem the property that has been seized.

Neither can I understand why a man in that condition, who thus deals with his creditors and his property and who abuses the confidence which the community have a right to place in men who hold themselves out as traders, if he stakes his money upon futures, if he engages in the business of buying and selling in the form stated property of the descriptions mentioned in the amendment, as we say dealing in futures, I can not understand why that man has not placed himself in a position to be suspected, both as to his motives and as to the soundness of his business transactions. I can not understand why we ought not to make that a cause for putting that man into bankruptcy.

Why, sir, if a commission merchant, or any man having the right to handle my property of any description whatsoever, upon whose honesty and integrity and morality I have placed confidence and faith, takes my money or his own and goes into the stock market and commences to bet money upon future dealings, that man has forfeited his right as a trader; and if he owes a thousand dollars, holding the character of a trader, his creditors ought to have the right to say to him, "You owe a thousand dollars; of course you would not owe it if it was not due, and you can not pay it; you are here put in default to the amount of a thousand dollars by the non-payment of overdue paper, and you have been engaged in speculation in futures, buying or selling, and that is as much evidence of your want of business integrity, your want of capacity to manage business for me or for other persons as if you had gone out of sight to avoid service of process, or had concealed your property, or had suffered a judgment and not paid it, or had made an assignment with preferences or without preferences in perfect honesty and good faith."

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator, is not the distinction this: In all those cases enumerated in the bill the things themselves are acts of insolvency or indications of insolvency. They are either the removal of the property from creditors whom the debtor is not paying, being actually insolvent, or they are indications of insolvency, while the man who does this thing may be absolutely solvent.

Mr. MORGAN. How would he be solvent if he had a thousand-dollar debt overdue and unpaid?

Mr. HOAR. That is not the phrase, "overdue and unpaid."

Mr. MORGAN. That is the phrase which precedes every one of these conditions. When you come to file a petition against a party and put him into involuntary bankruptcy, the first thing you allege is that he is a trader, and the next thing you allege is that he owes debts exceeding in amount $1,000.

Mr. HOAR. Exactly.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; owing debts.

Mr. HOAR. But he must do more than that. Of course he must owe the debts to a certain amount and he must be a trader; but a man may be a trader and owe a thousand dollars' worth of debts and be as solvent as any man in the world. I suppose you would not find one trader in ten thousand in this country who would not owe a thousand dollars of debts if he was a trader of any amount. Now, the bill says that if this man conveys his property away by an assignment, or prefers creditors, which is a sign that he does not mean to pay one and does another, or has his property seized for debt, or suspends, which are acts or proofs of insolvency, you put him into bankruptcy.

The Senator proposes that if a man gambles in futures, although he is not insolvent, although every creditor that asks him for his debt can get it, he shall be put in bankruptcy, and the Senator does not say that. That is what he means to say, but he does not say that. He does not say that the man who gambles in futures shall be put in bankruptcy, but he includes in his description the most innocent, proper, and necessary transactions in the world. He includes the marketman who agrees with a person whose family he is supplying with their ordinary provisions that he will put one hundred bushels of potatoes into their cellar next week. He includes a man who promises to purchase for the horse of the Senator some hay or some straw or some oats and put them next week into his stable or barn. The same logic would include the man who undertook to give him a supply of coal. He has not struck at the men who are insolvent and do these things. He has not struck alone at the men who do these things as gamblers or speculators, but he has struck at a very large, important, and necessary business.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, Mr. President, I strike at the same crowd precisely that the Senator from Massachusetts has struck at, for I adopt his semicolons, and divide my causes of bankruptcy up precisely as he has divided up his; and the prefix to the whole category of causes of bankruptcy is the language that I read:

That any person, being a trader, residing and owing debts exceeding in amount 1,000, who, after the passage of this act, departs from the State, &c.

Now does the Senator from Massachusetts mean that a man shall be insolvent before he can be put into bankruptcy? Can a man who owes a thousand dollars be put into bankruptcy because he may have concealed himself to avoid the service of process not in a case or not upon the debt that you may be trying to collect out of him, but to avoid service of process in some other legal proceeding, a proceeding of affiliation, or something like that? A man conceals himself owing a thousand dollars, and being a trader, to avoid the service of an injunction that he does not want served on him in some case, thinking that is the proper way to escape from the clutches of the law or from the tyranny of some man who is trying to prosecute him.

The Senator's bill does not say that man must be insolvent, but yet it is fully implied from the bill itself that he must be; otherwise you can not put him into bankruptcy, for a man who owes a thousand dollars and who may conceal himself to avoid the service of an injunction not connected with the thousand dollars he owes but connected with some civil demand would be put into bankruptcy under the Senator's bill unless he should come forward immediately and pay the thousand dollars the Senator demanded of him. If he pays the thousand dollars, of course he does not go into bankruptcy. Why so? Because he vindicates himself against the accusation of insolvency.

The involuntary system of this bill is predicated only upon the idea that the party proceeded against in bankruptcy is actually insolvent. The Senator from Massachusetts is not trying to put solvent men into bankruptcy. That is not the proposition. If a man's assets will pay more than his debts, say ten times over, the Senator from Massachusetts does not want him put into involuntary bankruptcy; but his bill provides for that if it provides for the category which the Senator has called to my attention.

I am entirely willing to modify this amendment by saying "a person, being insolvent, who shall after the passage of this act sell or buy, or agree to sell or buy," &c. I am entirely willing to do that, because I understood that to be the prefix to the whole affair; that the whole of this involuntary clause has been predicated upon the idea exclusively that the party proceeded against in involuntary bankruptcy must, as a matter of course, be insolvent. If he can pay the debt and escape all proceedings in bankruptcy, I take it for granted that if any man owes $1,000 and his creditor comes to him and says, "I am going to put you into bankruptcy," he can take a thousand dollars of gold or greenbacks out of his pocket and escape from that creditor; and that thousand dollars may be all he owes in the world. The whole of this bill is predicated, I repeat, upon the idea that it is a proceeding whether by a bankrupt upon the ground of his being insolvent or whether against him on the ground of his being insolvent, and it does not affect my amendment at all if the Senator from Massachusetts desires to have the words in to make it more explicit "or being insolvent shall," and I will ask leave to modify my amendment in that respect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. FRYE. Leave the comma after "preferences" and go on without putting in the words.

Mr. MORGAN. That is true, a comma there will do it, but perhaps I had better for the sake of caution leave the semicolon just where the Senator from Massachusetts put it in and add "or who being insolvent shall, after the passage of this act, sell or buy, or agree to sell or buy," &c.

That is all I have to say on that branch of it. The Senator from Massachusetts, however, thinks that a man ought not to be put in bankruptcy who is a trader and who may buy or sell provisions for delivery three days after the time of the contract. The Senator will notice the language—

> Or being insolvent shall, after the passage of this act, sell, or buy, or agree to sell or buy, for delivery at a future period longer than three days from the date of such sale or purchase, any stocks, bonds, or other securities, &c.

I grant that there is a good deal of difficulty in getting language together that will define precisely the line on which we wish to proceed in stopping this business of gambling in futures. But I first considered the subject in ignorance; the matter then went before the Committee on the Judiciary, and they reported back the very words I have now employed in offering the present amendment, and I take it for granted that that collection of words embodies the idea about as safely and about as clearly as perhaps any of us can do. It underwent very scrutinizing investigation in the Judiciary Committee, as I am informed.

A man who is the owner of produce—I care not how he has obtained it, if he is the owner of it, whether it has been consigned and shipped to him or not—has a perfect right to dispose of it after he becomes the owner of the property; but if he has a mere contract to purchase or a mere contract of sale on property not in esse, the property which he does not own and in respect of which he has a mere bargain under which he may become the owner, that man has no right to deal with that as property in his actual possession.

The evil of this system has become so notorious as that the whole country has manifested a very earnest desire that it should be checked. The Senator from Massachusetts has found a different set of commentators upon this proposition from those that I have seen. The impression that I derived from the criticisms of the common press of the country upon that feature of the amendment as incorporated in this bill before was that the Congress of the United States was doing good to the country by trying to cut off this business of engaging in futures. I can think of nothing that would have a more repressive effect upon it.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me for suggesting that if he would put into this clause the words which he now proposes, "being insolvent," and then would put in at the end "except for the purposes of supplying food, grain, or provisions"—not letting the exception apply to stocks, bonds, and securities—"to his customers for their personal use or for the use of themselves and their families in the ordinary course of business," so as to exclude the criticism which I made about its affecting ordinary provision dealers and coal dealers, which he certainly does not intend, he would answer my argument at least and save time.

Mr. MORGAN. I am willing to agree to that qualification, because that would have been precisely what I would have made the language read if I had sat down to write it anew; but I adopted this language because it had passed muster in the Judiciary Committee. I am willing to put that exception in, because I think it is proper. That is not a case within the meaning of this statute as we propose to make it; for a bona fide effort to supply a man's regular customers or to supply persons actually and in good faith with food, or with any of the articles mentioned here, except stocks and bonds, would be not merely a lawful but a commendable act, and I would not put a man into bankruptcy for that. If he was insolvent I would give him a chance to pay. The Senator from Massachusetts can draw that exception, and I will accept it as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama whether the introduction of the term "except in the ordinary course of business" would not be sufficient? That is a term which is pretty well defined by the courts and has a settled meaning.

Mr. MORGAN. I doubt that, because the "ordinary course of business" in Wall street is to deal only in futures.

Mr. WILSON. You are excluding that by the very terms of the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. The suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts seems to me entirely reasonable, and if he will write it out I will adopt it.

Mr. WILSON. The language suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts may give this a very narrow operation, much more so than either of the Senators would desire; but it seems to me that if the language should be "in the ordinary course of trade," or "ordinary course of business," it would accomplish the object of the Senator from Alabama without interfering with the ordinary transactions of legitimate trade.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator propose his amendment in form and I will look at it?

Mr. HARRISON. This amendment is certainly an important one, and I think in the general purpose of it very many of us would sympathize, I should think likely a majority of the Senate; that is, in so far as it is aimed at gambling transactions, those purchases and sales that are ideal and not real. They are the bane of all business in this country now. They are permeating all of our States from the great centers, seducing from their legitimate business pursuits the officers of our banks and our merchants. They are reprehensible in every direction.

This amendment ought I think to be so framed as not to include the cases of those who in perfectly legitimate trade contract to deliver to a slaughter-house a thousand hogs. A man knows that they are in his neighborhood; he knows the market price, and he makes a contract to go out in the community and buy them and deliver them. I take it that is legitimate trade, so of many other transactions in milk and butter and other articles of that kind. The sellers have not got them actually in possession when they contract. They make their contracts in advance, and they know where the articles are, and they go and buy them, and the contract is made with the purpose of an actual delivery of the thing to a person who intends to receive it and to make use of it in trade. I take it there is a margin there in which one may contract to sell that which he has not presently got, which is legitimate trade, and that we should do unwisely if we put in here a provision that would curtail that sort of trading in the community.

If this can be reduced to such form that it will apply only to the class of so-called trading that I first described, it will have my hearty concurrence, and it is the only way we can reach it perhaps by national legislation. But I was going to suggest that in order to reach this we might dispose of every other pending amendment and by unanimous consent agree that this only should be acted upon to-morrow, giving the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Massachusetts time to confer about it and make the proper limitations, and so let the bill go over, with the consent of the Committee on Appropriations, and have this single matter acted upon to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] (I do not see him in his seat) has twelve or fifteen amendments yet to propose.

Mr. HARRISON. We can go on with them now.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection to the course suggested by the Senator from Indiana, inasmuch as I want to make the language agreeable to the Senators who concur with me in opinion.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to say in regard to the proposition to continue the consideration of the bankruptcy bill to-morrow that I shall be obliged to-morrow to antagonize with it the Post-Office appropriation bill. I gave away this afternoon with the understanding that the bankruptcy bill would probably be disposed of in the course of thirty minutes. While of course the Senate will order its own proceedings, at the same time I shall feel instructed under the direction of the Committee on Appropriations to ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill immediately after the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON. I think we might have consent to reserve this single amendment and dispose of it in the morning hour to-morrow, getting through with any other amendments that may be offered to-night.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that we go on with all the other amendments, and then when they are finished reserve the right to act on this amendment till the morning after the morning business.

Mr. PLUMB. By to-morrow morning the Senate will have gotten itself so rested and so prepared for new discussion and there will be so many suggestions about new points of difference that I should despair of any conclusion being reached to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Alabama by inserting, after the word "or" where it first occurs in the fifth line of that amendment, the words "except in the ordinary course of business for the supply of his customers."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the amendment by inserting, after the word "or," in the fifth line, the words "except in the ordinary course of business for the supply of his customers;" so that if amended the amendment will read:

Or, being insolvent, shall, after the passage of this act, sell or buy, or agree to sell or buy, for delivery at a future period longer than three days from the date of such sale or purchase, any stocks, bonds, or other securities, or, except in the ordinary course of business for the supply of his customers, any grain, food, provisions, provender, or cotton, wool, sugar, salt, or tobacco, without such vender being, at the time of making such contract, the owner, or assignee, or trustee of the property sold, or agreed to be sold, or the authorized agent of such owner, assignee, or trustee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. CALL. If it is agreeable to the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Alabama I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HOAR. I yielded the time this morning on account of the desire on the other side of the Chamber, in the first place, to deal with some questions which were on the Calendar; so that I withdrew my motion to proceed to the consideration of the bankruptcy bill at the conclusion of the morning business. Then the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] desired to make a speech; and I was in hopes that every Senator would agree to stay and finish the bankruptcy bill to-night. We have got to do it some time.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts, while I am quite willing to stay as long as he may desire, that if we should come to a division at this moment I think the chances are ten to one we have not a quorum within the walls of the Capitol.

Mr. CALL. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] has several other amendments to propose, and their consideration would probably require a much longer time than he would be willing to stay.

Mr. HOAR. My fear is, as my friend from Mississippi is the great friend of the laborers of this country, as we all know——

Mr. GEORGE. Let me interrupt the Senator. Is it not a good thing to be a friend of the laborers?

Mr. HOAR. In one moment.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me ask the Senator if it is not a good thing to be a friend of the laborers?

Mr. HOAR. Let me finish my sentence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. HOAR. My friend from Mississippi is a great friend of the laborers. He has them constantly in his mind, day and night. My fear is that if he goes home, instead of having a good, honest night's sleep he will lie awake all night, and he will have more than fifty amendments to-morrow morning instead of the five or six he has now.

Mr. GEORGE. I think I should be allowed to say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir; I yield the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think it is any very great discredit to a man to be a friend of the laborers; and I do not think that I shall lose any more sleep in thinking about the laborers than my friend from Massachusetts will lose in thinking about corporations and that sort of interests in this country.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let us adjourn.

Mr. CALL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PLUMB. I give notice that I shall, at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow, move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. HOAR. I shall ask the Senate to continue the consideration of the bankruptcy bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 17, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BRIDGE ACROSS SAINT CROIX RIVER.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] yesterday called up a bill which could not be found, on account of a wrong number being indicated. The bill has been found, and the gentleman now asks unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill, which the Clerk will read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6538) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Saint Croix River, in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Chippewa Falls and Western Railway Company, created and existing under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, is hereby granted the right to construct an iron or steel bridge, with masonry piers, to be used by it, its successors or assigns, for railroad purposes or for railroad and highway purposes, and as a public highway, with continuous span, across the Saint Croix River from such point in the State of Wisconsin, in township numbered 30 north, of range numbered 20 west of the fourth principal meridian, in the county of Saint Croix, which said corporation may select to such point in the county of Washington, in the State of Minnesota, opposite thereto, as said corporation may select: Provided, That the bridge to be constructed under the authority hereby granted shall not interfere with the free navigation of said stream beyond what is necessary in order to carry into full effect the rights and privileges hereby granted; and that said piers shall be built at right angles with the current of the stream where said bridge may be erected, and that each span shall be not less than one hundred and twenty-five feet: Provided, That said bridge shall be and be considered a legal structure, and shall be a post-road for the transmission of the United States mails: And provided further, That the bridge shall be built with one span of not less than one hundred and fifty feet in the clear over the navigable channel, with a height of not less than sixty feet in the clear above low-water mark.

SEC. 2. That any bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said river as the Secretary of War shall from time to time prescribe; and to secure that object the said company shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawing of the bridge, and a map of the proposed location, giving, for the space of one mile above and one mile below the proposed location, the topography of the banks of the river, the shore lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the currents at all stages, and the soundings, actually showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War the bridge shall not be built; and the Secretary of War shall determine the proper length of the spans of said bridge, and the height thereof above high-water mark, and as to the plan of the bridge in all respects; and if it be found at any time that such bridge unnecessarily or materially obstructs navigation, he shall require the necessary changes to be made therein, in the interest of such navigation, at the expense of said company; and said company shall maintain, at its own expense, from sunset until sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Light-House Board shall prescribe.

SEC. 3. That the said railroad company shall have the right to construct passage ways on said bridge for foot passengers and vehicles of every description, and to charge a reasonable toll therefor; but the rates of toll shall be submitted to the Secretary of War and shall be subject to his approval and to any change he may think proper from time to time.

SEC. 4. That such alterations or changes as may be required by the Secretary of War or Congress in any bridge constructed under the provisions of this act shall be made by the said railroad company at their own expense; and it is hereby expressly provided that Congress reserves the right at any time to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRISON. I call for the regular order.

Mr. PRICE. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withhold the demand for the regular order till this bill can be passed. It is a matter of very considerable importance. The bill has passed the Senate. There can be no possible objection to it, and it will take but a moment. I should like to have it passed, that it may go the Senate, which has already passed a similar bill.

Mr. MORRISON. I insist on the regular order.

Mr. SPOONER. I rise to present a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. MORRISON. I withdraw the call for the regular order, that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] may call up the bill he has indicated.

The SPEAKER. Another matter is now before the House. After that is disposed of the Chair will again recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin.

EXPENSES OF COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS.

Mr. SPOONER. I am directed by the Committee on Accounts to report the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the expenses incurred by the Committee on Accounts and the subcommittee thereof, under the resolution of the House of Representatives of January 23, 1884, be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, the same being first approved and allowed by the Committee on Accounts.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SPOONER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS SAINT CROIX RIVER.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6538) called up by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE]?

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the title be read.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What committee reports the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the bill should be read.

The SPEAKER. The bill has been once read. If there be no objection it will be read again.

Mr. BEACH. I object. It is a long bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the bill has been read and if it places the construction of the bridge completely under the control of the Secretary of War, I do not object.

Mr. WASHBURN. It does. It contains all the usual provisions and conditions.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PRICE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REGISTRATION OF STEAMSHIPS.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6662) to authorize the registration of certain steamships as vessels of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Mr. JAMES. I ask unanimous consent to call up the resolution of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in relation to the public building at Brooklyn, N. Y., which I think is on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not at present in possession of the House. Unanimous consent was asked yesterday morning by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] to report the resolution, but the matter was postponed on account of the absence of the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. DIBBLE. I now ask consent to submit the report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, being a substitute for the resolution referred to that committee.

The SPEAKER. The original resolution will be read, and then the proposed substitute.

The original resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to furnish to this House copies of all orders, reports, recommendations, correspondence, and other papers on file in the Treasury Department relating to the purchase of a site for a public building in the city of Brooklyn and State of New York.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Whereas a resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds relative to the purchase of a site for a public building in Brooklyn, N. Y.; and

Whereas at a hearing before said committee specific charges were made, in writing, and filed with said committee, alleging complicity between some of the officers of the Government and the owners of real estate in said city, whereby it is alleged that the Government is likely to be required to pay an exorbitant price for the contemplated site; and

Whereas it is due to the Government as well as to the officers implicated that the facts should be ascertained: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is requested to furnish to this House copies of all orders, reports, recommendations, correspondence, and other papers on file relative to the purchase or contemplated purchase of a site for a public building in the city of Brooklyn, N. Y., and that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to investigate the charges made, with power to send for persons and papers; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to suspend negotiations for the purchase of said property pending the investigation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the substitute which has been read.

Mr. JAMES. Before the vote is taken I desire to make a brief statement. When consent was asked yesterday to report this substitute to the House and have it considered at that time objection was made by one of my colleagues [Mr. SKINNER] on account of my absence. That objection has been used by some of the journals of the city of New York to the prejudice of my good character and reputation. I therefore wish to say in the presence of the House that had I been present yesterday I should not have objected to the consideration of the resolution. The gentleman who did make the objection did so without my wish, and simply out of kindness to me, as I was absent.

So far as the purchase of the site for the public building at Brooklyn is concerned, I have no reason to doubt that every transaction in connection with it has been upright and honest. The amount which the Secretary of the Treasury thought he was allowed to expend for the purchase of the site was $450,000. The agent of the Government who had authority from the Secretary to make the purchase has expended for that purpose $501,082.50. I have here a statement of each item of the expenditure, the name of each person to whom the money was paid, and all the facts concerning the purchase of the property, which I shall publish in connection with my remarks.

I wish to have it understood that so far as I am personally concerned I do not care whether there is an investigation or not. The Secretary of the Treasury is perfectly willing to have the investigation; the Supervising Architect is willing that there shall be an investigation; and all that they ask is that the investigation be made promptly, in order that the work may go forward.

The table referred to by Mr. JAMES is as follows:

Lot 1.	No. 283 Washington street, Mrs. Augusta Titus		$30 000 00
Lots 2 and 8.	75 feet on Washington street, 160 feet deep, and 26 feet on Johnson street, Mr. W. A. Husted (numbers not known)		175,000 00
Lot 3.	Louis and Hermann Liebmann, 100 feet on Washington street (numbers not known)	$50,000 00
	Including Mr. Sherlock's lease for two years (cash)	19,500 00
			69,500 00
Lot 4.	No. 23 Johnson street, John Cassidy	33,000 00
	Including Thomas M. Fleming's claim to it (cash)	10,000 00
			43,000 00
Lot 5.	No. 25 Johnson street, Mrs. Margaret L. Taylor	13,500 00
	John F. James's commission	250 00

HERMANN LIEBMANN.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., April 16, 1884.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. When the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBELE] asked consent yesterday to report the resolution now before the House, I objected to its present consideration. I was aware that it involved a question of great interest to one of the cities of New York, and I also knew that my colleague [Mr. JAMES] felt a deep interest in the question so far as the construction of the building is concerned, and might desire to be present. I desire to corroborate Mr. JAMES'S statement by saying that not a word had ever passed between him and myself in reference to the investigation recommended by the committee. I knew simply that he was not in his seat, and I desired that when action was taken upon the question it should be done in his presence.

In this connection I wish to refer to a statement made in a morning paper to the effect that I was pressed by various members to withdraw my objection, and that it turned out that I was really objecting at the private request of my colleague [Mr. JAMES]. All I have to say in reference to that is that the statement is absolutely false in every particular. I knew nothing of the merits of the question so far as regards the necessity or advisability of an investigation. Having since been informed that the Secretary of the Treasury requests this investigation, that Architect Bell also requests it, and that my colleague has no objection to it, I certainly do not object, and wish simply to make this statement, having yesterday objected to the consideration of the resolution for the reasons I have stated. I may have done my colleague injustice by interposing an objection at the time, but there was certainly no understanding direct or implied between us. I simply did as I would have thanked any of my colleagues for doing under similar circumstances.

Mr. DIBBLE. I wish to say, on the part of the committee, that we have proceeded in this matter simply because the charges were before us in writing. We have no further comments or statements to present until we are authorized to investigate and report.

The question was taken upon the substitute, and it was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was then adopted.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. REED. What is the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is one reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds authorizing an investigation in regard to the purchase of a site for a public building at Brooklyn, N. Y.

Mr. REED. I understood that the regular order had been called, and that we were proceeding with it.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the regular order was withdrawn.

Mr. REED. It appears to me that this investigation ought not to take place.

The SPEAKER. The resolution has been adopted, and the question now is on the motion to reconsider and to lay that motion on the table.

The question was taken; and the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. SLOCUM. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2228) to "remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine, and to encourage the American foreign carrying trade," and that Saturday, April 26, be set apart for the consideration of the same.

Mr. RANDALL. I must object to that.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the resolution is not before the House.

SETH WILMARTH.

Mr. LOVERING, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and hereby is, authorized and requested to appoint a commission of three or five officers of the Navy to make full inquiry and investigation as to what, if any, compensation should be made to Seth Wilmarth, of Malden, Mass., for his invention and extra services in the construction of the great metal-planer now at the Boston navy-yard, for which letters patent of the United States were issued to said Wilmarth, under date of January 29, 1869, and for the use of said planer by the Government since its construction, and report the result of such investigation to this House.

CATHERINE LEWIS.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6663) restoring to the pension-roll the name of Catherine Lewis; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PATENT LAWS.

Mr. VANCE. I ask unanimous consent to present at this time, and have printed in the RECORD, certain resolutions of the convention of inventors, held at Cincinnati, March 25, 1884; also resolutions adopted at the meeting at Lowell, Mass., concerning the patent laws; and let the same be referred to the Committee on Patents.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly.

The resolutions are as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 4, 1884.

Hon. R. B. VANCE,
House of Representatives:

At the convention of inventors of the United States held at Cincinnati, Ohio, March 25-27, 1884, at which there was a registered attendance of some six hundred persons, and in connection with which over 4,000 inventors or owners of patents addressed letters of hearty sympathy and concurrence to the chairman of the executive committee, the resolutions set forth in the accompanying copy were unanimously adopted, and it was requested that the chairman take measures to have said resolutions presented to the Senate and House of Representatives now assembled in Congress.

Therefore, in pursuance of the foregoing, and at the instance and request of the president of the said convention, I herewith forward said copy and request that the said resolutions may be duly presented in the House and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Respectfully,

L. DEANE.

Whereas the incentive and rewards given inventors by the Constitution of the United States and the laws of Congress passed thereunder have done more perhaps than any one cause to advance our whole country to the front rank in wealth, resources, and industries among all nations of the world; and

Whereas any material change in those laws would in the opinion of this association seriously retard our material progress as a people: Therefore,

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in the United States Congress are respectfully requested to oppose the passage of any bill which would have the effect to discourage inventions by impairing the value of patented property or imposing any conditions on the owners of such property in prosecuting and maintaining their rights to the full value of their said property which are not equally applicable under the laws of Congress to the rights of all property and the remedies provided to protect the same for all citizens of our entire country.

Resolved, That the inventors, patent-owners, brain-workers, and citizens of the United States, in convention assembled, where patent interests antagonize no other, but benefit all classes of the community alike, demand the continued protection of our present patent system unimpaired by Congress.

Resolved, That since the money derived from the fees paid by the inventors to the Government is ample to pay all the cost and charges, it is the imperative duty of Congress to provide sufficient force in the Patent Office to do the work well, and to keep it up to date, and in all details and particulars to thoroughly equip the Patent Office for its work, by providing sufficient accommodations for its force, an ample library of books and publications pertaining to patent and scientific matters, and full and complete digests of inventions in all the classes, and rooms and means to enable the inventor and patentee to search into the novelty of any device or the state of the art in any given direction.

Resolved, That the dignity and importance of the business of the Patent Office demand that it should be severed from the Interior Department and made a Department by itself, with a head recognized as a member of the Cabinet.

Resolved, That since the matters adjudicated in the Patent Office are in a very large degree legal in their scope and bearing, it is the evident necessity of the case that there should be a distinctly legal bureau or division of this office, clothed with the authority to hear and decide said matters and enforce its decisions.

Resolved, That though there have been nearly 300,000 patents granted, there have been scarce a score of patents which the public has objected to, and no patent based on a wrong, which the courts have not finally held invalid.

Resolved, That since under our law the Patent Office must be self-sustaining, and since there are very large requirements to cover the expenses of properly equipping the Patent Office for full discharge of its duties, it does not at present seem to be expedient to reduce the Government fees on patents.

Resolved, That protection under the patent system is of more vital importance to us as a nation than the protection of any other industry connected with our Government.

Resolved, That Congress be requested to so modify section 4887 of the United States Statutes that letters patent for the invention of a citizen of the United States shall continue in force for the full term of seventeen years, whether such invention shall or shall not have been previously patented in any foreign country.

Resolutions adopted at the meeting at Lowell, Mass., concerning the patent laws.

Whereas it was provided in our national Constitution, in order "to promote the general welfare," that Congress should "have power to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries;" and

Whereas in accordance with the evident intention of the framers of the Constitution Congress has from time to time enacted laws whose promoting and fostering influence has placed America in an advanced position in every branch of the mechanical, manufacturing, and useful art industry of the world; and

Whereas while the patent laws so enacted have, through their general influence, been so beneficial, they have been such as to make possible the enforcement by unscrupulous owners of patents of unjust and oppressive claims for royalties against innocent users of patent inventions, proceedings which are at once afflictive to the public and destructive of sympathy for inventors as a body; and

Whereas it is proposed so to amend the patent laws that the rights of the people on the one part and the rights of inventors on the other part may be the more effectually conserved, to the relief and reasonable satisfaction of both, so as to defend innocent users against oppressive exaction on the part of patentees, and yet protect inventors against deliberate infringement on the part of willful, banded, or organized invaders:

Now, we, inventors, manufacturers, artisans, and others of the city of Lowell, Commonwealth of Massachusetts, duly assembled to consider the important question of the contemplated amendment of the patent laws hereinbefore referred to, having deliberated upon the matter in its various phases—

Resolve, I. That the object in view, hereinbefore described, meets our hearty approbation. That we regard as against the interests of inventors, and as against the public interests also, the continuance in force, without suitable modification, of those provisions of law relating to patent-rights which permit extortion; for an unjust and oppressive enforcement of patent law will result in rendering obnoxious the patent system itself.

II. That we should regard as inimical to the public welfare, repressive of invention and discovery, and opposed to advancement in the useful arts and to the increase and diffusion of knowledge, any enactment which should abridge the present duration of letters patents, or make the securing of patents more difficult or expensive, or add to the hinderances which the inventor now meets in suppressing infringement of rights granted him, or deprive the patentee of that sole and exclusive right for a limited term to the manufacture, sale, and use of his invention which he now enjoys.

III. That of the several pending bills which have come to our notice the following, namely, House bill 3925, House bill 3934, House bill 3617, and Senate bill 1558, not only fail to provide available avenues of redress for pirated inventors, but they would so embarrass inventors in pursuit of their rights as in many cases to render it impossible to secure simple justice.

IV. That Senate bill 1558, introduced by Senator VOORHEES, of Indiana, would impair contracts now subsisting between patentees and the public and be ex post facto.

V. That House bill 3925, introduced by Hon. Mr. CALKINS, of Indiana, not only deprives the pirated inventor of what he may now lawfully recover as a measure of fair damages, but encourages unlawful and secret manufacture by irresponsible makers who are supplied with capital in such ways as place their principals beyond the reach of legal process.

VI. That the House bill 3617, introduced by Hon. Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, would reduce the duration to that length of time which is frequently passed in bringing an invention into such notice and use as make it of any profit, and would therefore, by rendering it inexpedient to take out a patent at all, virtually annul the patent law so far as it relates to future inventions.

VII. That the House bill 3934, introduced by Hon. Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, is free from the objections, mentioned and not mentioned, which may be fairly urged against the bills above specified, and would, if amended in the spirit in which it appears to have been drawn, be quite satisfactory; and that we should deem it expedient so to amend section 2 of that bill as to leave to the election of the court the admittance of testimony for its information concerning damages, profits, or savings.

VIII. That these resolutions, humbly but sincerely and earnestly expressing the solicitude which all good citizens must feel concerning the fate of the patent laws which have, with all their faults, been so beneficent, and containing an assurance of our confidence in the wisdom of that branch of the National Legislature which is yet to pronounce judgment on the grave question at issue, be sent to the honorable the Senators from our Commonwealth, for presentation to the Senate of the United States, for such disposition as may be deemed due to this our prayer and remonstrance.

MINERAL WATERS, ETC., IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FIEDLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6664) for the better protection of manufacturers, bottlers, and dealers in mineral waters, beer, ale, porter, and other beverages throughout the United States within the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

DUPLICATE CHECKS.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 1705) to provide for the issue of duplicate checks be taken from the Speaker's table for reference. The consideration of the bill was objected to the other day.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH.

Mr. BUDD, by unanimous consent, presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of California, asking the passage of the Sumner postal-telegraph bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

Assembly concurrent resolution No. 1, relative to the postal-telegraph bill introduced in Congress by Hon. CHARLES A. SUMNER.

Resolved by the assembly, (the senate concurring), That we heartily indorse the postal-telegraph bill introduced in Congress by Hon. CHARLES A. SUMNER, of this State, believing it to be an eminently wise and practical measure, and one imperatively demanded by the interests of the people of the United States.

Resolved, That our Senators be, and they are hereby, instructed, and our Representatives requested, to support and by all honorable means endeavor to secure the passage of said bill.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to forward a copy of the foregoing resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

H. M. LARUE,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN DAGGETT,
President of the Senate.

Attest:

THOMAS L. THOMPSON,
Secretary of State.

TENTS FOR THE WEST VIRGINIA ARMY REUNION.

Mr. McCOMAS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for present consideration a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish tents for the next annual reunion of the Society of the Army of West Virginia, to be held at Cumberland, Md., in the month of September, 1884. We have passed several bills of this kind during this session.

Mr. BEACH. Let the resolution be read.

Mr. ROSECRANS and others called for the regular order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. HANCOCK. I move that the morning hour for the call of committees be dispensed with, my purpose being to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

The motion of Mr. HANCOCK was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

REPRINTING OF A DOCUMENT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] asks unanimous consent that House Executive Document 86, relating to trade between the United States and Mexico, be reprinted. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

SALARIES OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to report from the Committee on Appropriations a communication from the Postmaster-General which has been sent directly to the committee. I have once before called attention to this irregular practice. These communications should come through the House, and I hope the heads of Departments will take notice of this statement of mine, although they have not noticed my former one.

The SPEAKER. The rule of the House requires that these communications be sent to the Speaker, and by him laid before the House, to be properly referred. The Clerk will read the title of the document.

The Clerk read as follows:

A letter from the Postmaster-General, containing estimated deficiency in the appropriation for salaries of postmasters for the fiscal year 1884.

The communication was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CUSTOMS REVENUES, ETC.

Mr. SCALES. I ask that the joint resolution H. Res. 193, which has come back from the Senate with amendments, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Printing.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. Res. 193) to provide for printing certain documents relating to customs revenues and domestic exports for the use of Congress was taken from the Speaker's table, and, with the amendments of the Senate, referred to the Committee on Printing.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HANCOCK. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to resume the consideration of the pension appropriation bill; and pending that motion I move that all general debate in Committee of the Whole on that bill be limited to two hours.

Mr. RANDALL. Unless the gentleman knows that two hours more will certainly be occupied in general debate, I suggest that he modify his motion so as to close the debate in one hour. The general discussion has already occupied four hours.

Several MEMBERS (to Mr. HANCOCK). Say one hour.

Mr. HANCOCK. As it seems to be the general wish, I modify my motion so as to close general debate in one hour.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the pension appropriation bill, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6094) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and by order of the House all general debate has been limited to one hour, to be equally divided between the two sides of the House. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] having charge of the bill will be recognized to control the time in favor of the bill.

Mr. HANCOCK. I will yield first to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN].

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words in reference to the pending pension appropriation bill. In the Committee on Appropriations I was a member of the subcommittee which had the preparation of this bill in charge, and therefore am somewhat familiar with its several provisions.

As the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] has already stated in opening the debate, the amount recommended for 1885 in this bill is $20,684,400, while the amount reappropriated is $66,000,000, making in all a total of $86,684,400, which, judging by the payments of last year, will give an amount abundantly sufficient for the payment of the pension-list.

But, sir, I wish to address myself especially in reference to the provision limiting the amount to be paid for the preparation of pension vouchers. The committee I believe have been led into an error in the limitation which is inserted in the bill. For one at least, I am myself satisfied I was mistaken in favoring the provision limiting the amount to be paid for the preparation of vouchers to 5 cents apiece. It was unanimously agreed to in the committee; at least there was no objection made that I was aware of, and at the time I felt myself that the amount was amply sufficient. But upon giving the matter fuller investigation I am now convinced that 5 cents is not a sufficient sum; that it will not produce an amount sufficient to pay for the necessary clerical service in the different pension agencies.

Heretofore, Mr. Chairman, the limit per voucher has been 15 cents, and until now this has not been supposed to be too large a sum to pay for that purpose. The committee, however, have thought that it was too large, and I am inclined to believe it is too large; but at the same time I am satisfied that 5 cents is not sufficent, and I will give my reasons for that opinion.

The committee were led into the adoption of this limitation of 5 cents by certain statements made to it in regard to the cost of preparing these vouchers. It was stated that the pension agent in this city had these vouchers prepared at the rate of 25 cents per hundred. On examination I find that is not exactly the fact. These vouchers were printed with blanks, and all to be done was to insert the name. [Holding up a blank voucher.] Here is one of the vouchers, and it will be seen that the filling of all these blanks requires a considerable amount of writing. The pension agent here pays 25 cents per hundred for only filling one of the blanks with the name and number of the pensioner.

The amount appropriated under the provision of the bill for the payment of only 5 cents apiece for the preparation of vouchers covers not only the expense of preparing all these vouchers themselves, but it also includes all the clerical work done in the Pension Office. Furthermore, these vouchers are not prepared at one time. The clerk does not take a voucher and go through it at once and fill all the blanks at the same time, but it has to be gone through two or three times, and every time the rolls have to be examined with reference to each case. The work, therefore, is much larger than it would seem to be at first blush.

But, sir, I have taken the pains to ascertain the actual cost during the first six months of the year of the preparation of these vouchers. I judge this amount is a fair one for the reason that it is paid out of the agent's own pockets for the clerical work which this provision in the bill covers.

Mr. RYAN. Press that point, for it is an important one in this connection.

Mr. WASHBURN. The pension agent is allowed so much, and what he does not pay out for actual service of course he is able to retain as part of his profit.

Mr. RYAN. Just like a banker or merchant.

Mr. WASHBURN. It is just like a banker or merchant. I think it is fair to assume that the amount paid by those different agents during the last six months is not exorbitant. I find that for the year, taking sixteen out of the eighteen agencies, the cost was $104,407 actually paid out. This does not embrace the large agency at Philadelphia or the smaller one at Concord. The amount would have been much larger in case they had been included.

Now, the amount produced at 5 cents per voucher is only $66,400, showing that 5 cents apiece will not produce more than half the amount required to pay this clerical expense.

And so far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I do not see any reason why this appropriation should be made in this manner. I see no good reason why the appropriation should not be made in a round sum sufficient to pay for this clerical expense, because if the price paid is too small there will be a deficit, and a work of this kind cannot go forward. If, on the contrary, the amount is too large, as it has been I am satisfied the last few years, then the result is the pension agent has a perquisite.

So far as I am concerned, I am against perquisites in any shape. I believe in paying the officers of the Government a fair compensation for the work they do and the responsibility they take. If $4,000 a year is not a sufficient salary for pension agents, then make it larger. I think that amount is sufficient, notwithstanding the character of the duties and responsibilities they have incurred.

But, as I have said, if it is not sufficient make it sufficient, but do not pay extra compensation in the shape of perquisites. There are some pension officers in this country whose annual salary, as near as I can judge from the figures which have been received, will reach from $7,000 to $8,000 a year.

Mr. RYAN. And others who do not get $2,500.

Mr. WASHBURN. While some of the others receive as low as from $2,500 to $3,000. But I believe in this appropriation bill this principle should be abandoned. I believe it is a vicious one, and that in making appropriations we should appropriate a round sum sufficient to cover all proper and necessary expenses of the office and no more; and when the time comes for offering amendments to this bill I shall propose that in lieu of 5 cents apiece or 10 cents or any other sum that may be fixed for making out these vouchers, that, guided by the actual expenses incurred last year in the different offices, we shall make an appropriation sufficient to pay all these expenses. So far as this amount of 5 cents for each voucher is concerned, I am satisfied, on further investigation, that it is entirely inadequate. There is another provision of the bill which has been criticised and which I do not believe to be entirely satisfactory to any one, but I am of the opinion, upon the whole, that it had better remain. I refer to the provision with reference to fees paid to claim agents.

This legislation was suggested owing to the great abuses that had grown up in the payment of fees in advance of the allowance of the claim. The pensioners of this country have been robbed of hundreds of thousands of dollars for which they have had no service rendered, and it has grown out of the fact that the agents were able to collect their fees in advance of the allowance of the claim. The committee sought to strike down this abuse if possible, and therefore in the second section of the bill it is provided that no fees shall be paid until the claim has been allowed. That principle, whatever may be done so far as limiting the fee to $10 apiece is concerned, should be retained in the bill.

Mr. HANCOCK. How much time remains yet of the half hour?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has occupied ten minutes.

Mr. HANCOCK. I yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Chairman, I would like if possible to have some provision incorporated into this bill by which the claims now pending before the Pension Department may be adjudicated at an early date; and, as a part of my remarks, I ask to have read at this time for the information of the committee an amendment that I propose to offer at the proper time.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That no proofs shall hereafter be required, either in pending cases or those hereafter filed, as to the physical condition of the soldier in whose behalf said application is made at the time he was mustered into the service of the United States; and all claims heretofore rejected on that ground shall be reheard and, if the proof is satisfactory in other respects, be granted.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Chairman, the men in whose interest we legislate and discuss questions presented here to-day are rapidly growing old. They are fast passing away. The widows of the dead soldiers of the Army of the Union are growing weary of waiting for the fulfillment of the promises long since made to them. Congress has been, I may say, even lavish in its legislative promises; but in many particulars it has been most derelict in their fulfillment. Do you realize, Mr. Chairman, that over 300,000 claims are as yet unadjudicated? These claims were filed in the name of those who for their country gave all they had to give—their lives, their health, and their strong manhood. These claims are thus unadjudicated although twenty years have elapsed since the time when these men so suffered and died.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. May I interrupt the gentleman from West Virginia for a moment, since there was so much confusion in the Hall that I failed to understand his remarks as to the legislation of the present Congress. I would like to know, if he will be kind enough to repeat it, what that has to do with the subject?

Mr. GOFF. I did not allude to the legislation of the present Congress. But I say the Congress of the United States, while it has heretofore been lavish in its promises in this regard, has not, I claim, been particular enough to see that these promises have been carried out.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. That, of course, is entirely satisfactory to the committee of which I am a member. My impression was that the gentleman applied his remarks to the present Congress.

Mr. GOFF. It is because the present Congress has not as yet afforded the relief that I thought should be given that I am now directing my remarks to the amendment I propose to offer to this bill.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him for a moment I will say to him that I think it is due to the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay to say that, in reference to the class of cases which is now in the Pension Office and unadjudicated, the committee charged with this important duty in this Congress of devising legislation to meet that difficulty have devoted more time to its attention than to all other subjects which have been brought before them. In connection with the ablest counsel which could be secured in Washington, and with the assistance of the Commissioner of Pensions himself, we have gone over that whole subject and have already perfected and reported to the House a bill which, as we think, meets all of the great wants which have heretofore impeded the speedy preparation and adjudication of these cases. And so far as that committee is concerned, and its duties to the House, I think the results will prove that we have not only been energetic but zealous and faithful in the discharge of our duties, and I submit that when this body shall have criticised the bill which we have prepared for that purpose they will accord to us that credit. That is all I desired to say.

Mr. GOFF. I intend no reflection at all upon the committee of which the gentleman from Arkansas speaks. I am glad that they have at last appreciated the importance of this question, and that they have presented to this House the relief which I have suggested.

Mr. MATSON. May I ask the gentleman from West Virginia a a question?

Mr. GOFF. Certainly.

Mr. MATSON. I hold in my hand the gentleman's proposed amendment. I wish to ask him if he knows that the Committee on Invalid Pensions two months ago reported a bill which covers this matter even more strongly than the amendment he proposes?

Mr. GOFF. I know a bill of that character has been offered. Yes, sir; I think the Committee on Invalid Pensions have been very attentive to their duties in that particular. But I want to secure this legislation, and I think the best place to do it is on and in this bill, instead of taking the chances of bills that are away down on our Calendar, particulary the bill the gentleman from Indiana has alluded to. If all the gentlemen concede the importance of this measure, as they seem to do, if they concede its equity, if they concede that it is proper, why not place it upon this appropriation bill and let it become law?

For long, weary years, as I have said, the men intended to be benefited by this legislation have been waiting for it, and it has come not. These soldiers of the Army of the Union, these dead soldiers, are freedom's martyrs. They are jewels in the crown of liberty; they are worthy of the attention of this Congress; they are entitled to your serious consideration to-day; they gathered from all sections; they neglected all professions; they gave up all occupations; they sacrificed homes; they deserted wives, children, all; and they marched under your banner of beauty in the path of duty down into the jaws of death. And they did so not for a party, not for a section; nor did they do it for a creed; for men of all parties tasted of the dregs of the bitter cup, and soldiers of all sections and all creeds shared in the privations and the dangers and won the honors of the battles of the Union.

Why, Mr. Chairman, do you realize that the mothers of your then boy soldiers, many, very many of them, are without pensions to-day? It is even not short of crime that this state of affairs exists in this land to-day. I know that many of you will claim that there has been an immense amount of legislation in favor of the soldier; and yet I say, when you examine the reports of the Commissioner of Pensions you will see that these suffering mothers of the dead soldiers of the land are still asking in vain for the relief that has been proffered them. Why, sir, think what the country has gained; then pause and contemplate what they have lost. They have been taught in the school of adversity. They are not unacquainted with grief. The children of their love were given to the cause of country and at the call of duty.

All over your land to-day, in this beautiful springtime, the grass is growing green over the graves of their loved and their lost. These mothers for whom I speak gave all that they could give for the cause of their country. They have suffered more than we can here depict in language, or can weigh. This very hour to them is full of bitter anguish known only to those who in the bitterness of grief are continually longing

For the touch of a vanished hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I claim that the men who marched with Grant, the grandest of grand soldiers; that the men who marched with Sherman on his wonderful march to the sea; that the men who followed

Phil. Sheridan in the valley of the Shenandoah—an Eden turned to a seething hell; that the men who followed the gallant young Custer, who rode across the plains of the Old Dominion; that the men who followed the banner of that superb soldier, grand as his cause and true as his steel, Hancock; that the men who followed Garfield, our martyred and murdered President,

> The thread of whose renown
> The Fates to-day spin round and full,
> Out of their choicest and their whitest wool;

that the men who went with Fighting Joe Hooker above the clouds; that the men and the boys who were strong enough to seize the tiger of rebellion by the throat and strangle it in the jungles of the Wilderness—that those men should not be told to-day that they are not and were not then strong, able-bodied men. They should not now be required by living witnesses to prove that they then in that day performed well a duty that men could only perform when strong men.

The men, Mr. Chairman, who fought in the armies of Lee and Jackson, brave leaders of brave men—men who have given luster to the renown of the American soldier—those men, I say, to-day should not be insulted by being told they were vanquished by weak, disabled men. It is not only an insult to the men who fought with Lee and Jackson, but it is also an insult to the soldier of the Army of the Union to say to him that the foe he contended with was not as brave, as gallant, and as generous as himself. I say that the time has come when we should have this legislation and be done with these continual appeals for justice, all of which is conceded by each and every member of this House.

The men in whose interest is intended this legislation, which the honorable chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. MATSON] says has been proffered, the men whom the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] says his committee [on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay] has also provided for; the men for whose benefit I have offered this amendment—and dear knows I am not anxious how it is done so that it is done—the men in whose interest this is proffered have made it possible for a republic of over 50,000,000 people, strong in the affections of all its citizens, to realize at last that we are in fact a nation of freemen who dread no master, fear no king, and kneel to none but their God. [Great applause.]

Mr. MATSON addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will now be read by paragraphs for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, namely:

For Army and Navy pensions, as follows: For invalids, widows, minor children, and dependent relatives, and survivors and widows of the war of 1812, $20,000,000; and any balance of the appropriation for the above purposes for the current fiscal year that may remain unexpended on the 30th of June, 1884, is hereby reappropriated and made available for the service of the year ending June 30, 1885: Provided, That the appropriations aforesaid for Navy pensions shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund, so far as the same may be sufficient for that purpose: And provided further, That the amount expended under each of the above items shall be accounted for separately.

Mr. GOFF. I now offer the amendment of which I gave notice some time ago.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 20 insert the following:

"And provided further, That no proof shall hereafter be required, either in pending cases or those hereafter filed, as to the physical condition of the soldier in whose behalf said application is made at the time he was mustered into the service of the United States, and all claims heretofore rejected on that ground shall be reheard and, if the proof is satisfactory in other respects, be granted."

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve the point of order on that amendment. Such an amendment should come from the appropriate committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order must be disposed of now. The Chair will hear the gentleman upon it.

Mr. RANDALL. The point of order is that the amendment is new legislation and not in the line of economy. It would involve greater expense. But my chief objection to it is that it does not come with the approval of the Committee on Invalid Pensions or the Committee on Pensions.

A MEMBER. What difference does that make?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want to legislate in that way.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I understand there is a bill from the Committee on Invalid Pensions embodying the idea presented in this amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. That bill can be considered at the proper time. But we are not passing any bill now except the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I think that fact removes the gentleman's objection.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman from Iowa tells me there is a bill reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I make the further point of order that there is a bill to accomplish this object already pending.

Mr. GOFF. I will state to the gentleman that this is not the substance of that bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] has risen. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HAMMOND. I rose to make the point of order last stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that there is a bill for this purpose reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and that it is out of order by way of amendment to ingraft it upon this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia will be heard on the point of order if he desires.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] objects because the Committee on Invalid Pensions has not considered this matter; the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] objects because that committee has considered it.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman has not properly stated my objection.

Mr. GOFF. A word only as to the objection that the amendment is the same in substance as the bill reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions or the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will examine the two, he will have no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the provisions of the bill and of this amendment are not the same. This amendment may accomplish one of the objects intended to be accomplished by the bill of the Committee on Invalid Pensions; but it goes further than that. The amendment I have offered provides that men who were recognized as capable and able for duty at the time of the beginning of hostilities in 1861 and who were mustered into the service, whose names appear upon the muster-rolls—that those men shall be considered capable of duty at the time their names were so placed on the muster-rolls.

Now, sir, you and I in common with citizens generally are estopped by our conduct and our acts. Why should not in this particular the rule of estoppel apply to the Government also? It is said—even the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not deny it—that what is intended to be accomplished should be done. He will also admit, I think, we have a much better opportunity of securing this legislation in this appropriation bill than we will have by waiting to enact either one of the isolated provisions that have been alluded to. I hope the gentleman, unless he thinks it absolutely essential, will not insist upon his point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I insist upon my point of order. There may possibly be merit in the proposition of the gentleman from West Virginia; but we are not sufficiently informed as to the amount of money involved in his proposition.

Mr. GOFF. Will the gentleman allow me to say right there that if it is right we should not haggle over the amount of money?

Mr. RANDALL. If it is right, then it should come from the regular committee and not from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. REED. Under our system of rules the regular committee can not get a hearing.

Mr. RANDALL. I know the gentleman objects to our system of rules.

Mr. REED. Under that system the regular committee can not get a hearing, and so in this way you will kill it very easily.

Mr. MATSON. On the point of order I desire to say that the proposition offered as an amendment by the gentleman from West Virginia is very unlike the proposition contained in the bill referred to. His proposition is to prescribe a rule of evidence without any exception whatever, and therefore I think it may be safely said that it is not even in substance the same as the bill referred to.

The bill proposes possibly to prescribe a similar rule of evidence, but it expressly prescribes an estoppel against the Government. The proposition of the gentleman from West Virginia, as I understand it, does not prescribe an estoppel against the Government, but simply lays down an ordinary rule of evidence. The bill not only proposes to prescribe an estoppel against the Government, but in addition to that it excepts from the operation of the proposed rule certain classes of persons.

Mr. GOFF. In the usual practice of the law a party preferring a claim would have to prove in each and every particular all the things necessary to make out that claim. In this proposition which I have offered it is simply proposed to say to the soldier that as he was able to perform duty while in the service many years ago, that point of his case should be considered as closed; but that in all respects else he must make proof.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] if they would not be willing to accept as an amendment to the bill a proposition, not that the examination and acceptance of the soldiers should be regarded as an estoppel against the Government requiring proof from him of soundness of physical condition, but that the Government should have the onus of furnishing affirmative proof that he was unsound.

Mr. MATSON. That is what this bill proposes.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not myself like the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia. It seems to me that we should incorporate in this bill a provision that the presumption shall be in favor of the soldier, that the burden should be thrown upon the Government to prove the disability back of the muster. There is merit in a proposition of that kind, and no impropriety in its being incorporated in this bill.

Mr. CURTIN. That is very clear.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suggest in a spirit of fairness and of compromise that that is a good proposition to put into this bill.

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] is doing precisely what I was trying to do.

Mr. HISCOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MATSON. I was trying to insist that the provisions of the bill referred to were different from those of the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia, and therefore his amendment was not subject to the point of order that it was in substance a bill pending before the House. But I should not be prepared to support his amendment without some qualification such as suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. HISCOCK. I submit to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] whether he would object to an amendment incorporating that idea.

Mr. RANDALL. As a general proposition, I would say that I would not be willing to incorporate into this appropriation bill or any appropriation bill, so far as I know at present, any matter of legislation which would increase expenditures. If you want to legislate for the benefit of pensioners, do so through the proper committee, and let us know how much money such legislation will cost, and you will find it contributed with alacrity.

There is no hardship in this bill against any one. The provision incorporated in it is solely confined to legislation which will facilitate the obtaining of their pensions by soldiers entitled to them. Another point: I am not willing to legislate blindly in this way on this bill, especially when I remember our experience in regard to another bill, when we were told, and I was here at the time and heard the statement, that the proposed legislation would involve an expenditure of only $25,000,000; whereas before it is fully carried out it will result in the payment of $250,000,000.

Mr. LAIRD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] one question. Is he willing to add to this bill an amendment obligating the Government to pay these soldiers the pensions which are honestly due them, by compelling the Government to recognize this state of facts: that where a man complains of an injury or a wound received in the service, and it is established by his Army record that he served in the field three months or more during the late war, then the presumption shall be that he received the injury or wound in the line of duty? In support of such an amendment I desire to say that the operation of the present pension laws which you are trying to enforce and which I desire to amend is such that the men who have hospital records receive their pensions, while the men who were wounded on our battlefields and did not go to hospitals are the men to whom pensions are denied under the present system.

I will state the amendment which I propose, and which, taken in connection with that offered by the gentleman from West Virginia, will go far to correct the abuses of the system as now administered. Add after line 28 in section 2 the following:

Provided, That in all the cases now pending in the Pension Department, or that may hereafter arise, where the applicant for pension is shown to have served three months or more in the field and to have received an honorable discharge, all injuries sustained by him while in the service shall be presumed to have been received in the line of duty, unless the contrary be shown by proof, the burden of which shall be upon the Government. And when it shall be established by two or more credible witnesses that claimant has suffered from such disability since his discharge, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions to grant such pension as the proof shows the applicant entitled to.

Mr. HAMMOND. One word on the point of order. We have nothing in the world to do in this discussion of the point of order with the right of Federal soldiers to pensions. There has been no opposition here to anything of that kind. We have set apart a night every week in which they have a free run without opposition.

The only question is, shall all the rules of the House be set aside for their special benefit? There is pending now on the Private Calendar, and has been pending week after week, a bill to add to the pension-roll what the Federal soldiers on this floor have called a long list of bounty-jumpers. That bill has been crowded in on the Private Calendar and kept there contrary to the rules of the House; and now it is proposed by gentlemen to tack legislation on this appropriation bill, which they know is contrary to the rules of the House; and when the point of order is made against it the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] says that the rules are bad. Grant that they are.

Mr. REED. That is a good grant.

Mr. HAMMOND. Grant that they are, that is not the question for consideration. The question is, shall we violate the rules in this case and enforce them in cases that are agreeable to the gentleman?

Mr. REED. We had better disregard them in all cases.

Mr. HAMMOND. The gentleman would violate the rules in all cases, he says. He knows no rule but license. He would disregard all rule when it comes to putting on a bill what has no business there, because the legislation proposed is such as he favors.

Mr. WAIT. Mr. Chairman, the result which the pending amendment to the bill aims to accomplish is one which ought to receive the approval of every member of the House. If under the rules that control the action of the House the Chair should hold that the amendment is subject to a point of order, then I trust that the object sought to be effected by the same will be embraced in another bill which will receive the unanimous support of the members of this body without regard to party affiliations. The amendment in effect declares that the United States Government, when it received a man into its military service during the late war and had him examined by surgeons who were selected by and acting as the agents of the Government, and these agents had decided that he was then a sound man, free from disease of every kind, and in all respects fit to discharge the duties of a soldier, now aims to set at naught its own action at the time of his enlistment, and to compel him to go back twenty or more years and show what his physical condition was when he entered the public service.

The existing laws or rules of the Pension Bureau, ignoring the opinion of medical men based on careful examination, throw upon the applicant for a pension the burden to prove by testimony, which it may be impossible for him to obtain, the fact that he was free from disease of every kind at the time of his enlistment. His family physician may be dead. Parties in whose employ he was or who were his early associates may also be dead, or removed to parts unknown, or after so long an intervening time may retain no distinct recollection as to his physical condition when he entered the Army twenty years prior. In that way a soldier when he presents his application to the Government officials, asking them to give him a pension as a partial remuneration for loss of health resulting from the privations and exposures incident to life in a camp, or from confinement in a military prison, is coldly met with refusal on the ground that he can not show affirmatively by the testimony of medical men, commissioned officers, and comrades that he was in every respect a sound man when the Government by its agents examined and accepted him. A rule more unjust in its operation could scarcely be devised.

But it is not the soldier alone who suffers great wrong from the effects of this rule of the Pension Bureau. The soldier dies and his widow and children, often left without means to feed and clothe them, call upon the Government to give them the little aid which a pension may afford, and their request for justice is met with the cold response, "Prove by the evidence which our rules demand that your husband or your father was free from every form of disease when he left his home to peril health and life for his country." If it would be difficult for the soldier to reach the proof required to enable him to obtain justice at the hands of the Government, it will surely be impossible for the widow and the children to get the evidence that is demanded from them. In thousands of cases where the soldier, the widow, and the child of the soldier have claims that should be favorably listened to and their applications for assistance unhesitatingly granted, they have been debarred by conditions and requirements with which it is impossible for them to comply. These arbitrary and oppressive rules and requirements should be removed by the proposed amendment or other legislation of like character.

Mr. Chairman, I am often in receipt of communications from soldiers who are suffering under diseases which are the fruits of camp life, or from the widows of soldiers who have died from such diseases, telling me that they have failed to obtain justice solely from their inability to show the physical condition of the soldier at the time of his enlistment. The witnesses to whom they would look for aid have gone to parts unknown, or are dead, or have lost recollection in regard to the case. Let us now, Mr. Chairman, legislate in a way which will do partial justice at least to the brave men who periled life and sacrificed health to save this Union, and not only to them if they are living, but to their widows and children if they are dead.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND], in the enthusiasm of the moment, has allowed himself to say that I interposed, with relation to this amendment, as to whether it was in order or not. I did not do so. All that I did was to call attention to the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]. He objects to incorporating this provision into an appropriation bill on the ground that it should take its regular course; yet he is the individual who more than all others has rendered such a regular course impossible. In other words, he has insisted upon continuating and perpetuating a state of the rules which renders legislation impossible except on an appropriation bill; and then he will not let it go upon such a bill!

It may be that I am pressing this subject too often upon the attention of the House; but my notion of the way things go in this world is that you must have not only sound doctrine but reiteration of sound doctrine. You must not only call attention to existing evils but persist in doing so.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] illustrated another interesting feature of our rules. You can not offer an amendment to any measure provided a bill embracing substantially the same provision as the amendment is pending before Congress. Now, why are bills pending before Congress? Simply because there is a demand for such legislation, and the very reason that brings the bill before Congress—namely, the demand for legislation of that kind—is sufficient under our rules to keep any such provision off a bill that is passing through the House. In other words, you can make an amendment on any subject to which the public attention has not been directed, but you can not offer an amendment containing such a provision as the public demands! What an interesting state of affairs!

Here we are, with the business of three Congresses piled upon this House and with the prospect that the business of four Congresses will be piled upon the next. Yet the gentleman from Georgia says that we must follow our rules. I grant you that we must. We are obliged to be reconciled to the situation. This is all that can be said about it. But once in a while there may be such a thing as an expression of judicious contempt for this condition of affairs. [Laughter.] And I am very sure, whatever may have been the feeling at the beginning of this session, that to-day I have in this expression the hearty sympathy of this House. We are doing no business, because under our rules we deliberately sacrifice our time in such a way that it is impossible to do business. Why, sir, we waste an hour almost every day in cataloguing the decisions which have been made by the committees. As I have had occasion to remark heretofore, with perhaps some exuberance of metaphor, the only effect of the decision of a committee is that it enables the corpse to be put in a glass case where the friends of the deceased can look upon the remains. [Laughter.]

Here are 1,200 reports of committees upon our table, and no business doing except that which is presided over so well by the gentleman from Pennsylvania; and yet even he, majestically situated as he is, is not equal, even with the assistance of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], to the whole business of this country. Why, sir, you can not pour Niagara through a spout. I say the country ought to have a chance to have its business done, and under the rules of this House it can not get it.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, the theory in this House—and it should be the theory in every legislative body—is that rules are made to protect the minority. The majority can always take care of themselves.

Mr. REED. Not in this House.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], who, as a member of the Committee on Rules, took part in making these rules, should remember the magnanimity which the majority in framing the rules were willing to extend to the minority.

One other point and I am done. The rules provide for saving the money of the people. That certainly is a good purpose. In my judgment it is right in the line of the action taken in the several States. It prevents that system which predominated in so many State Legislatures, and which led to so much evil—the passing of omnibus bills. So glaring was the evil and so loud was the demand against it that in many of the State constitutions provisions were ingrafted absolutely prohibiting anything of that character by legislation. And the rules of this House have only gone in that direction. I confess I am willing to legislate in every general appropriation bill wisely, so far as my judgment will permit me, provided the public money is thereby to be saved, but never to legislate in these general appropriation bills when the public expenditures are to be increased. And that is all I have to say in answer to the criticism of the gentleman from Maine. The rules to which he has excepted rose out of the necessities of our situation. The country to-day is legislated to death. Instead of having too little, we have entirely too much legislation. We have more legislation, not only than is required, but more than the people demand. If there be one evil greater than another to-day in this country it is that we have too much legislation. In fact, as Jefferson said, "the world is governed too much." [Applause.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to remind gentlemen that it is not in order to discuss the merits of the proposition on the pending point of order.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say one other word. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says there is too much legislation. I do not say whether that is true or not, but I do say that Congress sits here for the purpose of hearing the people. It is the great and general court for the redress of grievances. I say that a verdict for the defendant, a verdict against a bill, is just as much the fulfillment of our duty as anything else. And when we, after examination, simply refuse to legislate in any case, we are doing our duty in deciding against the party. But when we will not hear a matter we have done injustice gross and most foul. [Applause.] You might as well say a court of justice was doing right when it decided for the defendant by refusing to hear the plaintiff. Why, sir, it is the great right of the people of the United States; they are entitled to have their grievances heard, and not put where they can not be heard.

It is not that we are called upon to do what people ask, but we are bound to listen to what they say; and I say to you some day or other the result of this damming up, these repeated refusals to listen to the people's grievances who come before us, will be a Congress that will do great wrong in the opposite direction. Our refusal to act will result in piling up public opinion which will force another Congress as far wrong one way as our Congresses have been wrong the other. Let us provide machinery for giving people decisions. What is the result of our present action? Why, every bill that is not acted on here goes to the next Congress on the ground that this Congress did not dispose of it, and so it will continue to go on until we are crowded beyond human endurance.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must again remind gentlemen that the question before the committee is the point of order, and that it is not in order to discuss the merits of the proposition.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I wish to say, in reply to what has been said on the subject of the difficulty of obtaining pensions by soldiers who are disabled and who are unable to furnish the evidence required under existing rules of the Pension Office, that the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay has had that question under consideration for weeks and has reported a bill which I believe will meet the difficulties which have been suggested, and will remove all the evils complained of. That bill is now upon the Calendar, and I have given notice, under the instruction of that committee, that I will call it up for consideration on Monday next if that committee is reached in the call—and it undoubtedly will be—and ask the House for its passage. If it be the disposition of the House to permit the offering of such an amendment, I will very gladly move it as an amendment to the pension appropriation bill now pending and ask that it be incorporated as one of its provisions. I will move it in lieu of the amendment moved by the gentleman from West Virginia. I do not believe his amendment should pass in the form in which it now is. It does not meet the difficulties which have to be overcome. Indeed it does not seem to serve the purpose for which it was intended. I will send to the Clerk's desk to have read at this time the bill to which I have alluded, as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. HAMMOND. I object. The question pending before the committee is whether the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia is in order. It is out of order to discuss the merits of the question while that is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point made by the gentleman from Georgia that it is not in order at this time to discuss the merits of the proposition. The Chair several times has already reminded gentlemen the pending question is on the point of order which has not yet been decided.

Mr. BELFORD. Since there seems to have been a pretty general discussion here, I think I ought to be permitted to say at least that the country will be gratified at the evidence of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which he himself gives, wherein he declares that he has become the custodian and protector of the Republican minority in this House.

The Republican party is able to take care of itself, and we do not ask his protection. The minority, for whom he says the rules have been made, demand this amendment. He, our protector, the man who would shield our morality and our virtue, stands up and says he is going to protect us in our rights when we are insisting that one of our rights is that this bill shall be considered.

What is the title of this bill? It is a bill making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States. I have letters on my desk from all parts of the country with reference to it. [Laughter].

Now gentlemen have had their say and I propose to have mine for a moment. I am speaking to the point of order, and the question is, is this amendment germane to the bill? How will you ascertain that until you look at the bill itself? What is this bill about except invalid pensions? That is what the bill itself contemplates. That is its subject-matter. Now I think that when a child looks like its father you ought to presume at least that he had some connection with that family and is germane [laughter] and that he is entitled to go in at the family board and the family table.

The gentleman talks about expending the money of the people. Does the mere presumption that a man who was a healthy man when he was mustered into the Army increase your public expenditures? Does your Treasury rest upon a miserable presumption? How does it increase the appropriations? In what manner does it increase them? In what measure, I ask, are they increased? This amendment says that every widow who lost her husband in the Army shall not be required to prove that he was a sound man when he entered the service if he had been examined and accepted by a board of officers appointed by the Government of the United States to determine whether he was able to serve or not. You know that he could not have entered into that army if he had a physical defect of any kind. If he had a crooked tooth, that would have rejected him before the examiners.

Do you not know that to be a fact, and why? Upon the old theory that he had to bite off the end of the cartridge, although in 1860 you know and I know that no man could bite off the end of a brass cartridge. [Laughter.] And you, understanding that fact, and notwithstanding the close and careful examination which was made by the officers of the United States, you say that the soldier's widow shall prove to this Government that he was a sound man when he went in! And you know how rigidly they were examined, stripped, inspected, their mouths opened like the slaves sold in the markets at Constantinople, and if sound they were mustered into the Army. But now under a mistaken policy of economy the gentleman expects, but it is a vain expectation, to ride into the Presidential office. [Laughter.] In that expectation he refuses us, the minority of this Republican House, whose virtue he has kindly undertaken to protect, the right to incorporate in this bill a just and wise and proper amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from West Virginia will again be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the twentieth line:

"And provided further, That no proof shall hereafter be required, either in pending cases or those hereafter filed, as to the physical condition of the soldier in whose behalf said application is made at the time he was mustered into the service of the United States, and all claims heretofore rejected on that ground shall be reheard and, if the proof is satisfactory in other respects, be granted."

The CHAIRMAN. This provision is proposed to be added after line 20, on page 2 of the bill. The preceding lines of the bill make an appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the ensuing fiscal year. The rule provides that no amendment shall be in order on any general appropriation bill which changes existing law except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures in one of three ways:

By the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, or by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of the amounts of money covered by the bill.

This amendment does not come within any one of the provisions required by the rule; and the Chair therefore is under the necessity of sustaining the point of order and ruling the proposed amendment out.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to move to strike out lines 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16 down to the word "provided," and insert in place thereof $86,640,400.

The reason I offer this amendment is because I believe it is wise that all appropriation bills should upon their face in figures and in terms carry the amount that is appropriated; and I shall be delighted to hear any member of the Committee on Appropriations give to this committee the reason why that should not be the case.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the only excuse for this legislation that I have heard offered upon the floor is that this House in the last Congress reappropriated a part of the unexpended balance or all of the unexpended balance of a preceding year. And upon every inquiry that has been made why we have this form of a bill before us we have been cited to the action of the last Congress.

I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, if he believes this species of legislation is wise? If we set a bad precedent does he believe it should be followed? What excuse is there for it? I remember very well, sir, the reason why we did it. I was told here upon the floor that I was attempting to cut down the appropriation bills and create deficiencies. An estimate had come from the Pension Bureau saying that $101,000,000 was necessary to pay pensions. I did not believe it. I went down there and made an investigation myself personally. The bill was reported to the House carrying $101,000,000, if I remember rightly. I say I did not believe that that sum was needed to pay the pensions. I went down to the Commissioner's office and investigated the question and became satisfied that it was not needed. I proposed to reduce the appropriation to $86,000,000. I was told in the committee-room that it was my purpose to create a deficiency. I repelled that charge. I was told here also upon the floor that it was my purpose to create a deficiency; and from abundant caution I put that clause in the bill. It was my action, and I am responsible for it. The result proves that I was right. We appropriated what was amply sufficient to pay the pensions. Of the $86,000,000 which was carried by the bill there is an unexpended balance to-day.

That, sir, is my explanation of what took place in the last Congress. It was done to answer the charge which was made, both in the committee-room and here upon the floor, that it was the purpose of the committee to create a deficiency to be provided for by this Congress. We created none whatever. We appropriated more than is required for the current year. As I understand, a part of the $86,000,000 will remain unexpended at the close of the current year—a considerable amount of it.

Now, the Committee on Appropriations take the money that was appropriated by a preceding Congress, and that a Republican Congress, and use that for the purpose of reducing the aggregate amount carried by their bill. I ask gentlemen of the committee if there is any precedent for that? Did we ever borrow from an excessive appropriation made by a Democratic Congress to eke out the payments of the Government for any fiscal year?

I ask, Mr. Chairman, for a better reason to be given, in view of the explanation I have made, for your borrowing from previous years, than has been given. As I have said, I believe this bill should carry the exact amount which the Committee on Appropriations believe is necessary to pay the pensions, that the people may not be driven to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to the report made by the Committee on Appropriations, to find out how much money has been appropriated. The appropriation bill itself should carry it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. If there is a man in this House that is estopped from complaining of this language in the bill it is the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] who has just taken his seat. I hold in my hand the pension appropriation bill of last year, and I find in that bill the very words which the gentleman seeks to strike out. He has been beating about the bush to get clear of the responsibility of it. Now we have done in this matter just as the gentleman from New York did. He says we encroach upon the appropriations of a Republican Congress. Does the gentleman not remember that he in like manner encroached upon the appropriations of a Democratic Congress in that particular?

Mr. HISCOCK. May I ask the gentleman when?

Mr. RANDALL. Why, last year.

Mr. HISCOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I encroached upon the appropriation of a preceding year, the appropriation of a Republican Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. But the gentleman also encroached upon a balance remaining from the year before, because these balances had been kept running until you reappropriated them. There was available at the beginning of this year $126,000,000; and there has not been at any time expended in any year more than $60,000,000. And I want to say here that the Committee on Appropriations, desiring to be absolutely secure about having every dollar that was essential paid to pensioners, have put in the bill more by $20,000,000 than there is any occasion for; the object being that we might be absolutely safe and not subject ourselves to the charge here or elsewhere that we were not providing sufficiently for the pensioners. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] will remember that he appropriated $86,000,000 and all the unexpended balances, and they proved to be $40,000,000, as I have said. We have done the same thing. That is all there is of it.

Possibly there may be objections in other respects to this mode of legislation, and it may be that the appropriation bills ought to state the amounts appropriated, but it is a safe way, and pensions are exceptional in my judgment in that particular.

But there is not any political advantage about it. There are being expended $60,000,000 a year for pensions, and everybody knows it; and we have appropriated so that we might be secure in these respects and not subject ourselves to the criticisms on the stump of political demagogues.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to strike out the last word. I shall be gratified, and no doubt the country will be, if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will follow the many good examples that I set him and not follow those which are pernicious.

Mr. RANDALL. Ah, now you confess.

Mr. HISCOCK. The only one that I now recall which I believe to be pernicious is the one which the Committee on Appropriations is here following, where they neglect to set out in the bill the amount of money which it carries. And after the explanation I have made I am somewhat surprised that it should be said that that provision in the last bill is an estoppel upon me now. If gentlemen will look at the report of the committee of the last Congress, certainly if they will investigate what occurred in the room of the Committee on Appropriations and what was said in the debates here, they will find that that provision was inserted to meet the charge which was being made that we were attempting to create a deficiency. It was for that reason that that language was inserted in the bill.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] says that we brought over unexpended balances from the appropriations of Democratic Congresses. The gentleman forgets that the unexpended balance which came over from the Democratic Congress was a deficiency which we appropriated for in the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress. We were compelled to appropriate $14,000,000—I think it was; at least we supposed that amount was necessary—to provide for a deficiency in the payment of pensions. As it turned out only a part of that amount was needed. It was out of abundant caution that the Committee on Appropriations at the last session of Congress adopted the provision which was contained in the last pension appropriation bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I never question the motives of people; I avoid that. But there is a notorious fact standing out of record that from some cause or other the appropriations made at the last session of Congress were over $60,000,000 less than the appropriations made at the preceding session of Congress. I am not going to inquire what the motive was; but the fact stands there and can not be controverted. One large item was the appropriation for rivers and harbors, which fell through. That accounts for $18,000,000 of the sum, that being the amount which was appropriated at the preceding session for that purpose over the veto of the President. But outside of the river and harbor appropriation bill it is a fact that the appropriations at the last session of Congress were forty million and over less than the appropriations at the preceding session.

The following are the amounts appropriated in the several appropriation bills at the first and the second sessions of the Forty-seventh Congress:

Mr. HISCOCK. It seems to be necessary that I should make some reply to the assertion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman attempts to argue from the fact that our appropriations in the second session of the last Congress were $65,000,000 less than the appropriations at the preceding session. It is true that the item for rivers and harbors was a large one. But if the gentleman will look at the history of the legislation of the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress he will find that we were compelled to appropriate $28,000,000 to cover the deficiencies of the preceding Democratic Congress, which deficiencies had been created by the failure of our predecessors to appropriate the necessary sums of money for the expenditure of the Government.

That deficiency of $28,000,000 embraced items of appropriations over which Congress has no control whatever, no discretion whatever, as I have had occasion to point out heretofore. The existing law created the liability, and there was nothing for Congress to do but to provide the money to discharge the liability.

And I will also say in all frankness to gentlemen on the other side that we were more economical in the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress than we were in the first session. So far as appropriations for specific objects outside of the general expenses of the Government were concerned, we did hold them down more closely in the second session than in the preceding session. The river and harbor bill and this item of deficiency of $28,000,000 will go very far to make up the $65,000,000 which the gentleman talks about, and I have no doubt that the remainder of the amount can be accounted for by an economical saving which we made at the last session. I shall be ready to point to the record of the last Congress, so far as creating deficiencies is concerned, and compare it with the record of this or any other Congress which has ever assembled here. [Here the hammer fell.] I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. WELLER. I renew the pro forma amendment. It was with regret that I observed the necessity for our worthy chairman to rule the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] out of order under the rules of the House, for I deem that amendment an absolute necessity to the soldiers and sailors, their widows and orphans, that they may have that justice which is denied them or many of them under existing law as construed (and properly, too, perhaps) by the Pension Department.

I did desire to obtain recognition by the chairman at the time the amendment was before us for direct discussion of its merits, in order to plant myself squarely before this House and the whole country as solidly in favor of the soldier and sailor, his widow and orphan, in the matter of their just demands against the Government, for the life of which they paid so dearly to save.

I believe that one of the most unjust conditions which these meritorious people have had to meet is the sorry fact that they have been compelled to prove the soundness of the disabled, after these years of time have gone by, before their claims can be further considered—before the scanty pittance allowed by the Government to those of the rank and file can be paid to them or their dependencies; and all this after an admission into the service at the first instance through the ordeal of a searching medical examination by such authorities as the Government saw fit to furnish. This I have ever regarded as a matter of grave injustice; for the authorities of the Government proclaimed to the soldier, his wife, children, and dependent relatives, that they could depend on the one fact, that an able-bodied and physically sound man had entered the hazardous service of his country. But my individual views ought of right to have less weight and be regarded of less importance than the deliberately expressed opinions of the soldiers or their widows and orphans as made by themselves in their own chosen language.

Therefore, to give weight of public opinion to the sentiment and substance of the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], and more especially to spur the proper committee on pensions to immediate action on bills now before them covering this point, I ask to have read by the Clerk as a part of my remarks a petition to this Congress from one single locality in my district to show the sentiment of those people in the premises of the bill or certain features of the bill under consideration. And, by the way, this petition is signed without reference to party—by Democrats, Republicans, and Nationalists.

The Clerk read as follows.

FREDERICKSBURG, April 8, 1884.

To the honorable members of the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, your petitioners, ex-Union soldiers and citizens residing in Chickasaw County and State of Iowa, would most respectfully urge upon your honorable bodies the passage of such laws as will estop the Government from requiring claimants for pensions to prove soundness or freedom from the particular disability at date of enlistment, and that we urge the passage of such laws as will direct the Pension Department to regard a pension claim established when the proofs are of such a character as would establish the same in a court of law; and the facts of his being mustered in the service and having performed the duty of a soldier should be sufficient proof of his soundness to establish his claim; and that we urge the passage of such laws as will entitle soldiers' widows to pensions without reference to cause or presumed cause of the soldier's death; and that arrears act be so amended as to allow a reasonable period of time to claimants for pensions to file claim therefor so as to embrace arrears, and your exertions in our behalf will be gratefully appreciated by us.

Signed by General Milo L. Sherman, H. B. Carpenter, and more than 60 others.

Mr. WELLER. That petition is from an isolated locality, and is signed by some of the best men in my district, who have been paid in "undying gratitude" too much, and in cash and lands for a homestead too little. The petitioners request, but I demand, that this unjust and unpatriotic feature of our present pension laws be swept from the statute-books and place be given to a law more humane and more in accord with the genius of our form of government; more in harmony with the spirit of this age and day of progress; more in keeping with the proclamations of many able gentlemen on this floor and elsewhere that they were the true friend of the soldier and the sailor who served in the late war, and therefore the friend of his widow and orphan. Let us have less of words and more of deeds, such as will prove conclusively that such words are not the fulsome offspring of deceit or hypocrisy.

I said this petition was from a single locality in my own county. I now send to the Clerk's desk, to have read as part of my remarks, a joint resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Iowa at its present session on this soldiers question.

I desire to have it read to show that this demand for justice to the soldier is not confined to a few isolated localities, but that the proper sentiment of the country is being aroused on this question of granting speedy justice to these deserving people. But before it is read I desire to state that long heretofore I had determined to present a bill covering this very question as also many other important questions of great interest to my people and to the people of the whole country, but have been deterred by a knowledge of the rules of this House that when a bill came up for consideration and amendment, that no amendment, however proper it otherwise might be and however much the people might demand the relief sought, yet it could not be entertained against the objection that a bill embodying such provisions was already before the committee for its consideration, and therefore the House even in Committee of the Whole could not entertain and act upon such matters while the same were pending before the committee.

Thus I have forborne to put bills before this House touching important matters, lest they sleep the sleep that knows no waking from the committee, and yet I am forbidden to offer and the chairman to entertain an amendment embodying the subject-matter of any other bill then before any committee of this House but unreported therefrom, even though germane. The rules of this House in that respect are the same as those of the last Congress in such particulars, and ought to be stricken out. I now ask the Clerk to read the joint resolution of the present Legislature of the State of Iowa on this matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Joint resolution No. 18.]

Memorial and joint resolution in reference to the applications for pensions.

Whereas thousands of applications for pensions are now pending in the United States Pension Office and have been pending from two to ten years; and

Whereas many of the applicants gave the best years of their lives, their health, their strength in the defense of their country, and many gave up husband and father; and

Whereas many of them have now no means of support, but have with their families been reduced to abject poverty and want: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That these applications of right ought to be speedily adjusted; that the expectations, hopes, and just rights of those who suffered wounds and disease for their country's good should not longer be delayed.

Resolved, Second. That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to use all their influence to secure the most speedy and adequate adjustment practicable of all such claims.

Resolved, Third. That the secretary of state be instructed to furnish a copy of this memorial and joint resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Approved April 7, 1884.

STATE OF IOWA, OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

I hereby certify the foregoing to be a true copy of the original on file in this office.

Witness my hand and the great seal of the State, April 9, 1884.

[SEAL.] J. A. T. HULL, Secretary of State.
W. T. HAMMOND, Deputy.

Mr. Chairman, the language of that resolution I doubt not is the very sentiment entertained by the great body of the people of our whole country, and it has long been thus; and the query is, why have the soldier's just demands been so long neglected? Why has it been left for this day, nearly a score of years since the close of the war? Why has the Legislature of my own State been called on at this late date to pass such a resolution, practically stultifying the past as to boasts of great love for the dear soldier, his widow, and orphan? Has it been because the Government had not wherewith to pay? If so, why has her Treasury been overflowing with silver dollars that would enrich these worthy ones so very much, in the stead of paying them out as we ought? Why stop the coinage of silver until these people are honestly, generously, patriotically paid for some of their sacrifices to maintain the old flag?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. In answer to the resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, which has just been read, I desire only to say that in this bill we give to the Commissioner of Pensions every clerk, every surgeon, every examiner that he has asked for, and I do not see how we could possibly do more toward securing the prompt payment of pensions than this bill proposes. We give all the money that has been asked for and twenty millions more.

I hold in my hands and would like to have printed in the RECORD——

Mr. WELLER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. WELLER. Is it not true that the great obstacle in the way of the procurement of pensions by soldiers, their widows or orphans, is the difficulty of proving that the soldier was sound at the time of entering the service?

Mr. RANDALL. It is very difficult, I admit, in many cases to trace the wound or disability back twenty years.

Mr. WELLER. I ask the gentleman further whether there is any reason in equity why there should not be attached to this bill a provision, embraced in other bills now before the proper committee, declaring that the burden of proof in respect to physical unsoundness of the soldier at the time he entered the service shall be thrown upon the Government, not upon the soldier or his widow or his orphan?

Mr. RANDALL. On that point I would rather take the judgment of the Commissioner of Pensions than my own, because he has had more experience in the administration of the law. So far as I know, he has not recommended, upon this bill at least, any change of the law in that respect. I believe he has expressed his approval of the bill of the gentleman from Indiana. Let that or any similar bill be brought up here for consideration. There is no difficulty about passing pension bills in this House. The House is always ready to pass pension bills. It meets one night in every week for that purpose. It is always ready to suspend the rules and give the Committee on Invalid Pensions a day, or more than a day, to dispose of their legislation. My objection to such legislation upon this bill is that, whether good or bad, it does not properly belong in an appropriation bill. A general appropriation bill should provide the amounts of money necessary under existing law, and should not embody new measures of legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WELLER. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand that the question is now on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 11 to 16 strike out these words: "Twenty million dollars; and any balance of the appropriation for the above purposes for the current fiscal year that may remain unexpended on the 30th of June, 1884, is hereby reappropriated and made available for the service of the year ending June 30, 1885;" and insert "$86,640,400."

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HISCOCK, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 60, noes 82.

Mr. BRUMM. I move to amend by adding to the section under consideration the following:

Provided, That upon the question of the physical condition of the soldier at the time of muster into service the common-law rule of evidence as to burden of proof shall be adopted in the adjudication of all claims for pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read by the Clerk.

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve a point of order upon the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I desire to reserve a point of order upon that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been reserved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]. In the opinion of the Chair the point of order should now be disposed of.

Mr. MCMILLIN. My point of order is that the amendment changes existing law and does not retrench expenditures; therefore it is not in order on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] upon the point of order. In discussing this point members are requested to observe the rules and confine themselves to the point of order, without entering upon a discussion of the merits of the question.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, the point of order raised by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] is twofold; first, that the amendment changes existing law; and secondly, that it does not retrench expenditures. As to the first proposition, I should like the gentleman to show me the law with which this amendment conflicts, or in what possible sense it changes existing law. The fact is that the Pension Department has established the rule of evidence which it deems justifiable, because it is held that the legislation of Congress in respect to pensions should be construed strictly, and therefore in the judgment of the department nothing can be done that might seem to go outside of the jurisdiction of the department in the investigation of the facts.

The law as it now stands provides that soldiers who have received certain wounds or incurred certain disabilities in the line of duty shall be entitled to pensions. This provision, as the Commissioner of Pensions thinks, makes it incumbent on him to require the soldier to prove affirmatively that the disability was received in the line of duty, and as a part of such proof to show that he had no disability when he was mustered in. Under the present construction of the law the soldier is compelled to prove a negative. I do not wish to criticise the action or opinion of the Commissioner of Pensions, but in my judgment this view of the law is not called for. The Commissioner, I submit, would have the right to presume that the soldier was sound in body and mind when he enlisted. He would have the right to presume, as all the rules of evidence presume, that the officers of the law performed their duty when they enlisted the soldier. The Commissioner would have the right to presume that when the soldier was mustered into the service he had all the qualifications necessary to entitle him to be mustered in. Among these are certain physical qualifications as to stature, health, &c. The presumption should be that the soldier had all these qualifications.

But the Commissioner of Pensions seems to think it became necessary to establish affirmatively again the fact that he had all these disabilities. Hence as to the first branch of the point of order, I say it is without foundation. It changes no existing law, but is simply declaratory of what the present law is, and it enables the Commissioner of Pensions to do as I believe Congress wishes him to do and as the people demands he shall do. And in that regard it is certainly not liable to the point of order.

As to the second proposition, that is, to the question of retrenchment of expenditures, I have this to say: Why, Mr. Chairman, the question as to whether these soldiers are entitled to their pension or not is matter of evidence, and the more you cloud the testimony the more you complicate the machinery by which you arrive at the proper facts, the more you expend the money of the people. Simplify your work; use the common-law doctrine; use the same rule of law and of evidence with the soldiers that you would use with the humblest claimant against this Government; use the same simple rules of evidence, and you will practically retrench expenditure.

How many employés are in the Pension Office to-day, kept there year after year for no other purpose than to haul and to overhaul, to adjust and to readjust, to examine and to re-examine, not finishing their work, but extending it from year to year, thus making your expenditure so much larger than it ought to be. My amendment means that you shall simplify the work of the Pension Office; that you shall say what shall be evidence and what shall not; what is their business and what is not. This is, in other words, to tell them at the Pension Office, you have no business to spend the money of the country in having men attempt to prove a negative. This tells them they must rest satisfied with the record evidence, and to presume all men are honest—that the men who went into the service and suffered disability were honest——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RANDALL rose.

Mr. BRUMM. I have not finished my remarks on the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I thought the gentleman had concluded.

Mr. BRUMM. No; I had not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is somewhat in doubt about the rule. Where the general debate has been exhausted under the order of the House, and the five-minute debate has begun, the Chair thinks that the discussion of points of order can not extend beyond the five-minute limit.

Mr. RANDALL. As I understand, this relates to the matter of clerk-hire. It is out of the 5 cents paid for vouchers the Pension Office is able to pay the clerks necessary to perform this service. It came to the knowledge of the committee that at 15 cents a number of pension agents were making over $5,000 a year.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman mistakes the amendment of our colleague.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand he moves to strike out 5 cents.

Mr. BRUMM. No, that is not my amendment. I ask that the amendment be again read.

Mr. BRUMM's amendment was again read.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the testimony in relation to pensions is ex parte. I believe the point of order rests against the gentleman's amendment. I ask for a decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide the point of order.

Mr. BRUMM. I should like to correct the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It is true the testimony is ex parte, but the rule of the Pension

Office is to throw the whole burden of proof on the defendant. I propose to apply the common-law doctrine to it.

Mr. RANDALL. You might do a great injury to the pensioner by establishing a new rule of evidence. As I have said, it is now ex parte.

Mr. BRUMM. Oh, no. If you establish that rule it shifts the burden of proof upon the Government, and that is the effect of this and nothing else.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide the point of order.

Mr. CURTIN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Payment of Pensions——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Every step in this discussion is important, and it is absolutely essential that we should know what is going on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is endeavoring to preserve order; and the public business will be suspended until order is restored.

Mr. CURTIN. I desire to ask the proper committee if they have not already prepared a bill which remedies all of this evil of which complaint is made.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I can answer the gentleman. Yes.

Mr. RANDALL. They have prepared a bill, which will be introduced on Monday.

Mr. CURTIN. It is quite unnecessary then, I imagine, for any member of this House to say that justice to the soldiers should be done and that the country demands it. There are none here who have any other opinion than that justice should be done to them. But if this amendment is doubtful, and subject to the point of order, why not let the proper committee bring in a bill which will remedy the defects complained of, and let us proceed with the consideration of this bill?

Mr. BRUMM. I have been told that there is such a bill, but I have not been able to find it, and I will thank any gentleman to read me a clause in that bill which covers this point.

Mr. CURTIN. I have no political record to correct on this question. I do not desire to review what has occurred in Congresses previous to this, nor have I any disposition in this way to gratify my desire to do justice to that class of our American citizens who defended this Government in its hours of peril. I understand that the Secretary of the Interior is prepared to rule now that the prima facie is with the soldier who was regularly examined and pronounced fit to perform service, and the burden of proof is thrown upon the Government to prove that he was not fit and that his muster was a fraud.

Mr. BRUMM. If that be the case, there can be no harm in the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. CURTIN. But to relieve the Secretary of the Interior from all doubt in the matter, I understand that this soldier [Mr. WARNER, of Ohio] has a bill which covers the subject and which will be presented for our action in a very short time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. In behalf of the Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, I will state that we have had such a bill under careful consideration for weeks. We have already reported a bill which meets the approval of the Commissioner of Pensions, and the committee has instructed the chairman to call the same up on Monday for passage under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. CURTIN. I suggest, then, that we had better go on with the consideration of this bill and let the committee report on that subject.

Mr. BRUMM. I should be glad if the gentleman from Ohio would read the clause of the bill which covers this point.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is best in this hasty manner and upon an appropriation bill to incorporate a provision or a clause that may affect injuriously even a solitary soldier of this country. Whatever is done, let it come after proper consideration from the proper committee. I am willing to put any amendment on an appropriation bill that comes within the rule and which has been judiciously considered by the committee. But here we may pass a law which will make it even more difficult for the soldier whom we are pretending to benefit to prepare or make the proof that is required of him in his application. I therefore make the point of order, which had better prevail unless the gentleman withdraws the amendment, and let us act upon a bill which has received proper consideration and is reported by the committee which has charge of the subject.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to remind gentlemen that this discussion must be confined to the question of order. We can not proceed with the merits of this bill if the time is to be consumed in discussing questions of order.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I would like to make a single observation, not directly to the point of order perhaps——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the merits of the bill when we reach that point upon which he desires to be heard.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I am not sure whether it will be directly to the point of order or not; that of course will have to be determined by the chairman; but a word only in this connection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I suggest to my friend from Pennsylvania that perhaps in its broadest sense the most unwise rule that could be adopted would be the common-law rule, because—and I emphasize it—because then you deprive the applicant for a pension of the right to testify in his own behalf at all. You cut him off from his right to testify, and I insist that no rule would be as detrimental to his interests as that.

Mr. GOFF. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide the point of order.

Mr. BRUMM. In order that there may be no misapprehension——

Several members addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair reminds members that this is on the point of order. No discussion can be permitted upon the merits of the bill while that is pending, although the Chair has listened to the suggestions of members. The Chair will also remind members that no business can be transacted in the prevailing confusion.

Mr. BRUMM. There is evidently, I only wanted to say, a misapprehension in the mind of the gentleman who spoke last as to the effect of this amendment. It does not go to the extent that he supposes——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair heard the gentleman's proposition, and will state again that it is not in order at this time to discuss the merits of the bill.

Mr. BRUMM. I do not want it to go to the country that I have offered an amendment here that is in any way injurious or detrimental to the rights of the soldiers, and the gentleman from Arkansas misapprehends the amendment. It has only reference to the question of prima facie upon the muster-in or at the time of mustering in, and no more.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then the gentleman, in order that the country may not misapprehend him, had better withdraw his amendment.

Mr. BRUMM. I beg pardon; I want the country to hear the amendment, but I do not want it to be misunderstood.

Mr. RANDALL. The country will judge of that.

Mr. BRUMM. I will take the result of that judgment. The country will understand the amendment if gentlemen do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to decide the question of order.

Mr. LAIRD. I wish to ask a question, to which I should like an answer from some member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide the question of order unless the gentleman from Nebraska desires to speak to the question of order.

Mr. LAIRD. I supposed that had been disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The same point of order substantially was presented on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]; and for the reason stated at that time the Chair sustains the point of order and rules the amendment out.

Mr. LAIRD. I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph under consideration for the purpose of asking a question of some gentleman of the committee.

I notice by the statement of the appropriations for 1883 that the item to cover the expense of the medical examination of applicants for pensions was $528,000. The same item for 1884 was $775,000. I notice that the appropriation in this bill for that purpose is $500,000. The deficiency bill that we passed a short time ago indicated that the amount appropriated in 1884 was less than the amount required.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Nebraska is alluding to the deficiencies of 1883 and 1884; and now he asks the authority for our appropriating $500,000 for the current year. I will give him the authority, and that authority is the Commissioner of Pensions himself, in a communication which reads as follows:

> Estimating the examinations to be made during the ensuing fiscal year at from 100,000 to 120,000, it will require, it is believed, about $500,000 to pay the surgeons, provided the fee remains as it is now fixed by law.

The amount may not be the same because the fee may be changed. If it is not changed the Commissioner of Pensions states that the amount is sufficient. If the fee is reduced, so much less would be required.

Mr. LAIRD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Add to the end of line 20:
> "And provided further, That the mother of a deceased soldier shall be assumed to have been dependent upon her son, within the meaning of the pension laws, if at the date of his death or at any time subsequent thereto she had no other adequate means of support."

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve the point of order on that amendment until I can examine it; but I am willing to hear the gentleman from Kentucky explain his object.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] offered an amendment, to come in at the end of line 20, to the effect that a soldier was presumed to be sound when he was received into the United States Army. The present ruling of the department, with certain exceptions, is that he must prove that he was sound at the time he entered the Army and that the disease from which he claims to suffer and on which he asks a pension was incurred in the line of duty. I desired to offer what the Clerk has just read as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, but for some cause I could not get the floor at that time, and I offer it now. It may be that the point of order will lie against the amendment, but I hope neither the gentleman from Pennsylvania nor any other gentleman will insist on the point of order. It is a matter of simple justice, and it occurs to me that this is the readiest way to rectify the wrong that is now done to many dependent mothers claiming pensions before the department.

Under the present ruling the mother is compelled to prove that she was dependent on her son. Now, it is very hard for the mother to prove at this time that she was dependent upon a son who was just entering manhood and went into the Army and lost his life; but it is easy for every one of us to see that she was soon to be dependent upon him, and that she would have been dependent upon him more or less from that time to this. But no mother, however much she may be suffering now, if she can not prove that she was dependent upon her son at the time he enlisted, can get a pension for that son's services, although he may have lost his life in the service. It strikes me that there is here so clear a case of injustice that we should not higgle about it for a moment.

I believe if my amendment be adopted it will effect a saving in this way: The clerks here in the department have more trouble from this one small point than perhaps from any other that comes before them—I mean, to get the proof to convince the average clerk. I do not mean to cast any imputation upon the clerks as to their competency. On the contrary, I will go out of my way to say that I do not believe there are any clerks in any Department of the Government that do as much and as honest work from day to day as do the clerks of the Pension Bureau. But those clerks, hard-worked as they are, are not unfrequently nonplussed to tell whether a widowed mother is entitled to a pension, the difficulty being on the point whether she was wholly dependent or in part dependent upon the son when he went into the Army. Every one can see that when the son went into the Army, and a few months afterward lost his life in the service, although the mother might not have been dependent on him at the time he went into the service, she would have been dependent on him if he had lived until now. My amendment seeks to remedy a matter of gross injustice, one that annoys the department not a little, and we ought to make the amendment in this bill, because if we wait until it is reached in the regular way it may not be reached during this session.

Mr. RANDALL. As the gentleman from Kentucky has spoken on the merits of his proposition, I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] to make a statement, that it may be seen that in making the point of order I am not opposed to the proposition, but I make it because it has no place on this bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I wish to state that the bill I have heretofore referred to cures the defect of which the gentleman from Kentucky complains.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. But does the gentleman think we will pass it this session?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I hope we will on Monday.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist on the point of order?

Mr. RANDALL. I do, for the reason I have stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, on the grounds already stated in connection with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], sustains the point of order.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For pay and allowances of pension agents: For salary, fees for preparing vouchers, rent, fuel, lights, and postage on letters to the Executive Departments and to pensioners, $174,400: Provided, That from and after July 1, 1884, agents for the payment of pensions shall receive only $5 for each 100 vouchers, or at that rate for a fraction of 100, prepared and paid by any agent in excess of 4,000 vouchers per annum: Provided further, That from and after July 1, 1884, there shall be no more than twelve agents for the payment of pensions; and it shall be the duty of the President, and he is hereby authorized and directed, to reduce the pension agents to not exceeding the number aforesaid; and so much of sections 4778 and 4780 as is in conflict with this provision be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. WASHBURN. I move to amend the paragraph just read, in lines 25 and 26, by striking out "$174,400" and inserting in lieu thereof "$240,000." Of the amount named in the bill $66,400 is for the preparation of vouchers at 5 cents each. As I have already intimated, that sum is not sufficient to meet the actual expenses of the clerical services of the office.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to reserve the point of order on the amendment. There was so much confusion when the amendment was read that I could not hear it distinctly. I supposed that it applied to only the charge for vouchers; but it seems to refer to something else. That is the reason why I want to reserve the point of order. I would ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] why he does not make his amendment apply alone to the vouchers, separate and distinct from anything else?

Mr. WASHBURN. I want to increase the amount here appropriated so as to cover an increased amount for the preparation of vouchers. The amount here named, $174,400, is for the preparation of vouchers at the rate of 5 cents for each voucher, and also for salaries for pension agents, rent, fuel, light, postage, &c. I propose subsequently to offer an amendment providing that the sum paid for the preparation of vouchers shall not exceed 10 cents each.

Mr. RANDALL. I have conferred with the members of the Committee on Appropriations about that, and we have agreed that the amount shall be increased to 10 cents.

Mr. WASHBURN. Then there should be the increase of appropriation which I have indicated.

Mr. RANDALL. The subcommittee which prepared this bill, of which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] was a member, gave, as I understood, full examination to the question and agreed upon the sum of 5 cents per voucher. The gentleman has made further examination since, and I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] agrees with him that the amount should be increased to 10 cents; and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, is of a like opinion. I should not, therefore, like to take the responsibility of making a point of order upon the proposition to increase the rate for the preparation of vouchers to 10 cents.

Mr. CANNON. If my colleague on the committee [Mr. WASHBURN] will allow me, I would ask him why it would not be better to first fix the amount to be paid for the preparation of vouchers, and the rest will be a mere matter of computation?

Mr. WASHBURN. The amount named in the bill is based upon a calculation of the amount required to pay for vouchers at the rate of 5 cents each.

Mr. CANNON. A few lines further down in the bill is the provision allowing 5 cents each for the preparation of vouchers. If it is the sense of the Committee of the Whole to make the amount 10 cents, that will be a material amendment, and if adopted the appropriation in the paragraph can be changed to correspond, as it will be a merely formal matter of computation.

Mr. WASHBURN. I intended after getting an increase of the appropriation in the paragraph to move an increase in the amount to be paid for each voucher.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. As I have taken up some of the time of the gentleman, if the Chair will recognize me I will yield my time to him.

Mr. WASHBURN. It may be that the Committee of the Whole would act more intelligently if I should move the other amendment first.

Mr. HANCOCK. I would inquire of the gentleman why it would not be better to pass over this portion of the paragraph for the present, until we see what the Committee of the Whole will do in regard to the other matter?

Mr. WASHBURN. That is what I was suggesting, that the committee would act more intelligently if they were called on in the first instance to vote on the amount to be paid for the preparation of the vouchers. I will therefore yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] to move an amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I can give the amount at once which will be required if the change to 10 cents per voucher is made; it will be $240,800.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I think we had better first vote on the amount to be paid for the preparation of vouchers.

Mr. WASHBURN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will pardon me, there are members of the committee who think that the amount should be more than 10 cents.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; but I understand that the majority of the committee have agreed to make it 10 cents.

Mr. WASHBURN. I will yield to allow an amendment to be offered to test the sense of the Committee of the Whole as to whether the amount should not be increased to 12 cents.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope not.

Mr. CANNON. If it can be demonstrated that 10 cents per voucher will not pay the expenses of the office and leave the salary, then there should be a larger amount given.

Mr. RANDALL. Ten cents is quite adequate. I am advised that some of these agents have received as high as $6,800 a year.

Mr. CANNON. And others have not received so much as the salary intended to be allowed them.

The CHAIRMAN. This can only be settled by an amendment moved in the proper way. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] has withdrawn his amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN. I withdraw the amendment, and yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] to move an amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I move to amend, in line 29, by striking out "$5" and inserting in lieu thereof "$12;" so that it will read, "agents for the payment of pensions shall receive only $12 for each one hundred vouchers," &c.

I am satisfied that it is not the intention of the committee to reduce the compensation in this particular so that we will not be able to obtain efficient men to discharge this duty. In examining the law I find that the present rate of compensation——

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to reserve all points of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late to reserve points of order; discussion has been begun on the amendment and the committee have commenced its consideration.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The present law gives these officers: first, a salary of $4,000 per annum; second, 15 cents for the preparation of each voucher in excess of the $4,000; and then they are also allowed for rent, fuel, and postage on checks and vouchers sent to pensioners and upon letters to the Department at Washington. The legislation proposed in this bill is exactly the same as the present law, except that it reduces the compensation for the preparation of vouchers to 5 cents each.

Now, out of this total sum received the agent must pay, first, his own salary; second, thirteen regular clerks, according to the computation of the Commissioner of Pensions; third, extra clerks four times a year, when the quarterly payments are being made: fourth, stationery, envelopes, &c.; fifth, printing; sixth, all postage other than on correspondence with pensioners and the Department; that is to say, postage must be paid on all letters to claim agents, attorneys, and friends of the pensioners, Senators and Members of Congress, and examining surgeons. For postage on correspondence of this description no allowance is now made by law. Seventh, the agent must pay for all office fixtures and furniture, except when he has accommodations in a Government building, and there are but seven out of eighteen who are thus accommodated. Then the agent has to pay all current expenses. In addition to this, he is responsible for all arrears in payments. These arrears frequently amount to $500 or $800 at a time, as I learn by conference with the Commissioner of Pensions. The Commissioner, after careful examination, estimates that the compensation under this proposed legislation will average $8,839 for each agent, while the average expenditures of each will amount to $9,532; so that under the bill now before the Committee of the Whole these pension agents will not receive one dollar of compensation, but will have to advance out of their own pockets to this great Government $693 each. This is the effect of the bill, as the Commissioner of Pensions shows, after telegraphing all over the country and receiving responses from sixteen out of eighteen pension agencies.

I will give the details of that estimate, so that the committee may know the basis of the Commissioner's calculation. The salary of the agent, as fixed by law, is $4,000; the estimated allowance upon vouchers for each agent, $4,839; making the total receipts of the agent $8,839. The estimated disbursements of each agent would be these: For one chief clerk, $1,500; for one principal clerk, $1,200; for nine clerks, at $600 each, $5,400; for eight temporary clerks, about ten days each quarter, $832; stationery and printing, $600; making the total disbursements $9,532; the deficit being, as I have said, $693.

Now, I desire to show how this bill would operate as applied to the agency at Des Moines, in my State, which pays pensioners in Iowa and Nebraska. I have obtained my figures by correspondence with the pension agent himself. That agency is one of the most economically administered in the country. I will vouch for the agent as a man of ability, who gives his entire energies to the discharge of the duties of the office.

Let me show you how the bill would operate in respect to that agency. That office pays 16,000 vouchers quarterly, making the amount annually 64,000. Deducting 4,000 vouchers, as required by law, we have left 60,000 to be paid for under this bill at 5 cents each, making $3,000. To this add the salary of agent, $4,000, and the gross receipts of the office are $7,000. What does the agent actually disburse? He pays his chief clerk $1,500, his second clerk $1,000, being $200 less than the estimate of the Commissioner. He pays three clerks $800 each; making $2,400.

Mr. HISCOCK obtained the floor, and said: I yield my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I wish gentlemen to bear in mind that this is one of the most economically managed offices under the Government. For temporary clerks, stationery, and printing this agent pays $1,000; for extra postage, $125. Thus the total disbursements of the office are $6,025, leaving for the agent only $975. That office disburses over $4,000,000 every year. The agent gives bond to the Government in the amount of more than $300,000. He devotes his entire time to the business of the office. Yet this bill proposes to give him $975! I say that this legislation will destroy the efficiency of the service, which I do not believe either side of this House wishes to cripple.

At 12 cents per voucher the agent would receive a total salary of $5,175, which I submit is but a reasonable compensation for so important an office, the incumbent of which gives such heavy bonds and handles so large an amount of Government funds.

I have not fully examined the figures furnished by the Commissioner of Pensions; but I believe my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has done so and will make a statement of the matter to the committee. From a hasty inspection I should say that the average salary would be a little more than $4,000. I do not believe that the able chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, or the gentlemen at the head of the Pension Committees of this House—I do not believe that gentlemen on either side of this House wish to bring the compensation of these agents down to such a rate as will throw the work into the hands of inferior and inefficient men. Let us continue to have in these offices, as we have now, men of ability and integrity, who will discharge their duties with skill and efficiency, and satisfy the pensioners of the country with the work that is done for them.

The Commissioner of Pensions says it is hard to suggest an improvement to the present service; it is so efficient and well conducted. Let us not therefore in our attempts to get at a reduction of expenditure strike a vital blow to an arm of the service which should find guardianship in every heart present in this Chamber.

Mr. MATSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the present amendment is exhausted.

Mr. MATSON. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, the law has fixed the compensation of the pension agents at $4,000 a year. The law intended he should have that much in the way of compensation, and no more. The amount which has been fixed heretofore to be paid for filling out each voucher was intended by the law to cover the expense of clerk-hire as well as other contingent expenses of each pension office.

Mr. CANNON. There was so much confusion in the House I was unable to hear what was said by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MATSON. I will repeat what I have already said, and I will do it for the benefit of the gentleman from Illinois. The law has fixed the salaries of pension agents at $4,000. It intends that as compensation for the office. The sum allowed for filling out vouchers was designed to cover the contingent expenses of the office.

Now, sir, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] has demonstrated that the sum of 10 cents for each voucher will give to his pension agent a salary of $3,975, which is within $25 of the amount intended to be fixed by the law as compensation for each pension agent.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to say a word?

Mr. MATSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I said that under the average expenditure the compensation of these officers of the Government would be much less in other districts than in my own. In my district of Nebraska and Iowa the amount used in running the office is lower than the average. You will find by reference to the figures at the Pension Office that 12 cents per voucher will give no more than the compensation contemplated by the law.

Mr. MATSON. The expenses are not so much in Iowa as they are in Illinois, and I presume there are more pensioners on the roll at Chicago than at Des Moines, and there certainly the compensation of the agent is sufficient at 10 cents a voucher. If 10 cents a voucher is sufficient at Iowa, as shown by the gentleman, it ought to be more than sufficient at Chicago, where there are more soldiers on the roll. It has been stated by the gentleman from Iowa that he is satisfied the proposition to pay 10 cents for each voucher will enable the agent at his place to receive within $25 of the salary contemplated by the law. It will only encroach upon his salary to the extent of $25, and I think it is not unfair to infer among the number of clerks, one at $1,500 and one at $1,000, he will be able to retrench the expenditures of his office sufficiently to supply the loss of that $25.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. He must pay for extra postage with the examining boards of his district, with claims agents, and with members of Congress. He has to pay for ice and various other incidental expenses of his office. They all have to come out of this voucher allowance.

Mr. MATSON. I heard the gentleman's calculation, and he allowed $125 for postage. The agent uses the penalty envelope when he corresponds with pensioners. He allowed $1,000 for the contingent expenses of the office, and still he brought the pension agent within $25 of the amount allowed by the law in the way of salary. He allowed everything for the pay of these clerks, and perhaps there are not too many of them.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion in that connection?

Mr. MATSON. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If the number of pension agents shall be reduced, as contemplated in this bill, will that not tend to increase the salary of the remaining pension agents considerably?

Mr. MATSON. Of course.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. And that has been left out in the calculation of gentlemen?

Mr. MATSON. It makes the office more lucrative, as a matter of course.

Mr. HANCOCK. As this is a very sensational question, in which a number of honorable gentlemen seem to take a very lively interest, and as I think they ought to be indulged in making two or three speeches upon questions as they present themselves, I have not sought to prevent them from indulging in that pleasure.

This, however, seems to me a very simple proposition, upon which the committee having the bill in charge may be said to be practically agreed. It is probable that they retrenched a little too far on information they regarded as satisfactory in striking out the original allowance of 15 cents and substituting 5 cents for each of these vouchers, and upon subsequent information they are willing now to agree that the amount should be fixed at 10 cents. That will within a trifle be sufficient to defray the entire expenses of any of these agents and leave to the agent his entire salary of $4,000 without any labor, or more than that of the general superintendency of the agency, chargeable to him.

I take it that gentlemen of character and capacity, sufficiently competent to take charge of this duty of the Government, would not think it a very great hardship upon them if they should themselves fill up a few thousand more of these vouchers. The estimate of my colleague on the committee has, I think, put in a little bit more than is just and fair in the way of incidental expenses to which the agent will be subjected. He would include furniture, houses, soup—no I believe it was not soup——

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Soap.

Mr. HANCOCK. Yes, soap. [Laughter.] I did not know but that my friend intended, since he has been so liberal to them in other respects, to feed and board them as well as to lodge and clothe them at the same time. But in that matter I think that these gentlemen can be left to take care of themselves, for they have to live any way whether they hold these positions or not.

But as to this little matter of postage which they will have to pay in writing letters to members of Congress, to Senators, probably to some attorneys, or somebody else, in connection with these claims, that seems to be a very insignificant sum. But it will be observed that provision is made in this bill for just such items. It will be observed on an examination of the provisions of this bill that it covers liberally such items. There is a provision here:

For contingent expenses of pension agents, $10,000.

Now, I think that would be ample to meet all of these little contingencies; and the estimates by which my friend shows that 12 cents is absolutely necessary to meet these expenses are erroneous and misleading, for 10 cents will be found ample for all these requirements.

For myself I would rather err on the side of a sufficient appropriation which would guarantee prompt and efficient and reliable service, an appropriation that would provide all that is necessary. Still I think that 10 cents for each of these vouchers will be ample for all purposes. I think my colleague's calculation will show that is enough, if he utilizes the $10,000 of the contingent fund to be used for all of the little expenses he speaks of here, and which we could not very well compute or specially appropriate for. Therefore we made a lump appropriation providing for such emergencies in order that with the amount paid for each of these vouchers these agents would be left their absolute salaries untouched. If in order, therefore, I move to strike out "12" and insert "10" in the amendment.

Mr. RYAN. I suppose the only conclusion that we desire to reach is a just one. What we desire to ascertain is what appropriation is needed to maintain these agencies. That these agencies are conducted economically every gentleman will infer at once when it is known that all the agent can save from the revenues of his office, from these vouchers at the present rate of payment, is his. He hires the clerks for the least possible salary that he can get them. He works them the greatest number of hours that he can. In other words, he conducts his office precisely as a banker would conduct his business or a merchant his.

Now, we have official data to show that for six months the revenue from these vouchers at sixteen of the eighteen pension agencies is in round numbers $74,000. We have official data to show that for the same period of time the amount paid out of that revenue at these agencies is $59,000. If you will reduce the $74,000 of revenue one-fifth you have an amount almost exactly equal to the expenditures; so that if you reduce these vouchers one-fifth you have the exact sum necessary to maintain the offices, and that is 12 cents per voucher. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield to me the remainder of his time?

Mr. RYAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. I merely want to say this is not a matter to be debated about if we get the facts. We all agree these officers should have $4,000, as the law provides, and no more.

I hold in my hand a statement compiled at the Pension Office from the returns for six months, made by sixteen of these agents, and from those returns, the agents hiring their own clerks and paying them out of their own pockets, this state of facts appears: In the six months they each paid an average of 495,920 vouchers for which they received pay. Now, at 10 cents a voucher that number produces $49,592, whereas the expenses, which are here also stated officially, are $58,425, the fees upon these vouchers falling short nearly $10,000 of paying clerk-hire and the incidental expenses.

The salaries, therefore, of these agents, if you put it at 10 cents a voucher, are cut down at the rate of $10,000 for six months, or $20,000 for the whole twelve months. You may just as well understand it. If you put it at 12 cents a voucher, then for six months this will amount to $59,510.40, only about a thousand dollars in round numbers above the expenditures for clerk-hire and the incidental expenses. If you put it at 12 cents, taking the last six months of business for the foundation of the calculation, you leave them the salary of $4,000 per annum, as the law provides, while if you put it at any less you will reduce their salaries of $4,000 by just that much.

That is all I want to say. It is not my figuring; it is the figuring the facts make on the last six months' business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MATSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] a question.

Mr. CANNON. If I have time I will be glad to hear the gentleman's question and answer it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired and debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order. Two amendments are already pending—the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa to insert "twelve," and the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] to strike out "twelve" and insert "ten."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Can I offer a substitute to make the amount "eight?"

The CHAIRMAN. That would not be a substitute. The question is on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Texas to strike out "twelve" in the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa and insert "ten."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Would not a proposition to substitute "eight" for "twelve" or "ten" be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. That would be an amendment in the third degree and would not be in order.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest that the gentleman from Texas may withdraw his amendment temporarily and the gentleman from Ohio can renew it.

Mr. HANCOCK. I withdraw the amendment for that purpose.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I renew the amendment.

There are about 320,000 pensioners upon the rolls. Four times that number of vouchers are required to be filled out. The average to each agent is about 68,000. But the number is constantly increasing. It will soon probably average 75,000 to each agency. That is, there are now from 17,000 to 18,000 pensioners on the average to each agency, each requiring four vouchers a year.

It is well known, Mr. Chairman, that these vouchers are largely filled out by local help; by ladies who are employed a few days each month. Type-writing machines are also used to save labor, and other economizing methods are adopted. With a constant increase in the number of vouchers, 10 cents a voucher will afford, in my opinion, ample compensation to the agents in addition to the fixed salary, $4,000. Five cents I deem too small, but at 10 cents, with an increasing number to be filled out—and on each one of them there is a gain—the compensation, in my judgment, will be ample. I therefore favor the amendment of 10 cents.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] said that he did not wish that these pension agents should receive more than $4,000 salary. In other words, he said that was sufficient, and I quite agree with him. Now let me give you the Commissioner's figures. The Commissioner's estimate at 15 cents is $199,200. The amount required at 10 cents on that basis would be $132,800. The average amount to each of the twelve agents at 10 cents is $11,066, which is not only adequate but in my judgment is quite liberal. I hope therefore the proposition fixing 12 cents will be voted down and that the rate of 10 cents will be adopted, in accordance with the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SMITH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can oppose the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH. The question with me is not as to the amount to be paid for a voucher; whether 10 cents or 20 cents shall be paid for each voucher. The question with me is whether some system shall not be devised to dispense altogether with vouchers. I can not conceive why my friends here who have looked so carefully into this matter should not have adopted some system by which the pensioner should be paid directly by the Treasurer of the United States, just as a public creditor is paid. The roll of pensioners is all here before us. It is in the Department of the Interior. The Commissioner of Pensions has it printed. Now, with that roll before him the Treasurer of the United States can make out a check for each pensioner payable to his order and send it to him; and when it comes back indorsed by the pensioner, as it must be, it is the highest voucher that the Government can have that the right party has got his money.

That is done with the creditors on the 3 per cent. bonds, the 4 per cent. bonds, and the 5 per cent. bonds, without any use of vouchers. Now will some one tell me why you should require a voucher from the pensioner, when you do not require it from the creditor of the United States? Here they are; both parties are known; the names of the creditors are in one book, and clerks are detailed at the proper time to make out the check for them, and as the time comes around quarterly each creditor receives his check. Why not adopt that rule in reference to the pensioners? Why should there be this needless expense in regard to pensioners? Why must a pensioner four times a year certify that he is a pensioner, when the fact is already known and his name is borne on the rolls of the Interior Department.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman desire an answer to that question?

Mr. SMITH. I do, if you have an answer.

Mr. CANNON. It is done for the purpose of protecting the pensioner. In the case of the payment of interest on the public debt, the recipient is able to identify himself all the way through. But if the same system should pertain to the pensioner that pertains to the public creditor, the result would be that the pensioner would be shaved step by step by parties he would get to identify him and to verify his indorsement.

Mr. SMITH. That is an entire mistake. So far from being shaved he would have his check from the United States and it would be cashed without the slightest trouble. But now, instead of getting the United States Treasurer's check, he gets the check of the paying agent, and it may or may not be paid promptly, just as the agent happens to have funds to his credit in advance.

There is no difficulty at all in the pensioner being paid by any savings-bank or other bank without any trouble if he has the Treasurer's check. All he would have to do would be to present that check. But now what does he have to do? The pension agent gets his money from the Treasurer, and it is sent to Philadelphia or Pittsburgh or Chicago or any other one of the places where pensions are paid. He takes the money of the United States and it is deposited to his credit as the paying agent.

Then the agent after all this circumlocution about vouchers has been gone through with gives the pensioner his own check, either payable to bearer or to order. Then the pensioner has to get it shaved if the agent does not happen to have funds on hand, or he may get it paid at some future time. I want to put the pensioner upon a footing of equality with the creditor of the United States; then you can dispense with all this circumlocution about vouchers and the pensioner will receive his check from the Treasurer payable directly to the order of the pensioner.

Mr. GOFF. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. GOFF. The amounts payable to pensioners differ very materially, not every quarter, but many quarters different amounts are paid. In case a child should become above pensionable age, or in case a widow should remarry, or in case the pensioner should die, it is necessary to make out the voucher in order to show exactly what is coming to the pensioner.

Mr. SMITH. But that appears on the pension-roll; there is no difficulty about that.

Mr. GOFF. It does not appear on the pension-roll when a pensioner dies or a widow remarries.

Mr. SMITH. The pensioner would have some representative. There is no difficulty about that. Suppose that a creditor of the United States should die; there would be some one to represent that creditor.

Mr. GOFF. But there are 800,000 pensioners scattered all over the country.

Mr. SMITH. That need not make any difficulty. There are probably just as many creditors as there are pensioners. There need be no difficulty whatever on that point.

I have looked into this matter before. At a former session of Congress I reported a bill to this effect from the Committee on Appropriations, which had then the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Commissioner of Pensions. They thought there would be no difficulty about it. No one can give a satisfactory reason why a pensioner should be paid differently from what a creditor of the United States is paid, or why you should require more from a pensioner in the way of vouchers as to his identity than you require from a creditor of the United States.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and Mr. HOLMAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. 1404) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers in either of the States of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 1412) authorizing the Secretary of War to adjust and settle the account for arms between the State of South Carolina and the Government of the United States.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session, and proceeded with the consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. WASHBURN. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] will withdraw his amendment I will renew it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will withdraw it.

Mr. WASHBURN. I renew it for the purpose of saying only a word further. It is to be presumed that we all expect to pay these pension agents the salaries fixed by law, and no more—$4,000 per annum. That is supposed to be adequate and entirely sufficient. Now, as a matter of fact, under this allowance for the preparation of vouchers many of these agents have received considerably more, probably some have not received quite that amount, but there are few, if any, who have not received $4,000.

This system of making the pay of agents depend upon the number of vouchers does not seem practically to work very justly. For instance, I find that one agent gets $6,800 a year—that is to say, he saves enough from his allowance to give him with his annual salary of $4,000, $6,800—while another agent barely realizes the amount of salary allowed by law. For this reason I have suggested that it would be well to strike down this whole arrangement of allowance for vouchers. I find from a statement which I have here that for the first six months of the present fiscal year the average cost of all this clerical work was a little less than 12 cents per voucher—that is to say, 12 cents per voucher was sufficient for this purpose. I believe that with the proposed reduction of pension agencies and the increased number of pensioners—something like 325,000 for the coming year—10 cents per voucher will probably cover the actual expense of doing this work; and this, I presume, is all that the committee desires to do. For one, I can see no objection to adopting the amendment substituting 10 cents for 12 cents; and as that amendment has been, I believe, withdrawn, I desire to renew it.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I wish to submit a substitute for the paragraph under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute can be considered as pending, but the first question will be upon the amendment of the gentleman from Texas. The Clerk will read the proposed substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the whole paragraph commencing with line 23, and insert the following:

"That from and after the 1st day of July, 1884, the duties now by law devolving upon pension agents shall be performed by paymasters of the United States Army, to be detailed for that purpose and stationed at such places as may be deemed most advantageous for the convenient, effective, and economical execution of the work by the Commissioner of Pensions and the Paymaster-General of the Army, under such regulations as they may prescribe, subject to the approval of the President. And the Paymaster-General of the Army may assign to perform duty under the foregoing provision any officer of his Department now on the retired-list of the Army who may be deemed suitable, and who, while doing such duty, shall be allowed full instead of the three-fourths pay he is allowed on the retired-list; provided that the pay of officers detailed for these duties and the allowances for clerk-hire, stationery, postage, office-rent, and messengers shall be those authorized in the Pay Department, and no more."

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve a point of order upon this amendment. I do not know whether it is subject to the point of order; but I will say that the Committee on Appropriations has not authorized the acceptance of such an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order may be reserved, if there be no objection; and the Chair will hear the gentleman from California on the merits of the proposition.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Mr. Chairman, I have made inquiries as to the capacity of the Pay Department of the Army to respond to such a demand as this amendment would make upon that branch of the service, and I have been informed that it can do so. Although under the recommendations of the Paymaster-General himself the law has already provided for the reduction of the paymasters' corps, which provision the Paymaster-General expects to execute as fast as the law contemplates, there are still twelve extra paymasters, so to speak, beyond what the law requires, and the contemplated reduction can only take place by death or casualty and the stoppage of promotions.

We have to pay these paymasters; they are accustomed to business; they have their clerks and their organization for work. Besides, I am informed by the Paymaster-General that there are four or five of the retired paymasters who would be suitable for this duty and would be glad to accept it. If they should be assigned to this service, each of them would, under the provisions of the amendment, received $750 a year more than he is now paid. This, with the allowance for quarters, would cover all the additional expense that would have to be provided for in the Army appropriation bill; and the Paymaster-General thinks there would be, under this arrangement, a saving of $84,000. I am satisfied that the reduction would be greater.

Mr. Chairman, a great deal is said on this floor about the vast expense of making these quarterly payments to pensioners. But it may well be asked what is the need of so many pension agents? To whom do they personally deliver any pay? And of what advantage is it to a pensioner to receive a check from a pension agent at Knoxville rather than from one at Washington? I doubt whether any gentleman can show any advantage in such a system. I do not see any necessity for having even so many pension agents as are provided for by the bill of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman will examine the records, he will find that the cost to the Government of paying pensioners is but $4.76 for each thousand dollars disbursed; whereas the cost of paying the Army of the United States through the paymasters is $23 for every thousand.

Mr. ROSECRANS. That may be the fact, but there is no just ground for making a comparison of that kind.

If this substitute should prevail we shall reduce expenditures, while I think it can safely be said we shall obtain at least equal if not greater efficiency in the service. It seems to me likely that this proposed arrangement will be more convenient to the great majority of pensioners than the present. Under the existing system only a few pensioners residing in the neighborhood of each pension agency can receive their pensions directly from the agent, and I take it for granted, from the nature of the case, that payments are not made personally except when absolutely necessary. Even in these cases the pensioners have to dispose of their checks. Why would not every purpose be served if pensioners should receive the checks of paymasters stationed at such points as may be selected by the Commissioner of Pensions and the Paymaster-General, with the approval of the President of the United States? The present system has disadvantages of which I would like to speak and which I think the adoption of this substitute would remedy.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS].

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand that a point of order is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] reserved a point of order. The Chair stated that if there were no objection the gentleman from California might proceed.

Mr. RANDALL. Upon examination I think the amendment is not subject to a point of order; but of course the gentleman from New York can make the point if he wishes.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order, and would like to have it passed upon.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I believe I have been recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama was recognized.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I yield my time to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I was about to state that in my judgment this substitute will remedy some of the evils which attend the present system and are indeed inseparable from it. I shall not undertake to specify particularly, but I am satisfied from actual inquiry of a serious kind that there are some abuses growing up and that some of the pension agents have been compelled to divide their salaries and contribute money for political purposes, and that when they could not be induced to do it they have been removed and others put in their places who were of a more accommodating temper. This disadvantage, this sort of corruption will at least be dispensed with by the proposition I have submitted for the consideration of the committee.

Mr. CANNON. My friend from California has made a statement, and I should be glad to know from him who is the pension agent to whom he has referred and when was he removed—whether before the civil service law was passed or since?

Mr. ROSECRANS. I have no doubt the gentleman from Illinois would be glad to know.

Mr. CANNON. Yes, I would.

Mr. ROSECRANS. At the proper time, I will be glad to tell him, but for the present I must decline.

I have no hesitation in saying, Mr. Chairman, it is my belief from actual knowledge that when I make that statement I am within bounds, for there has not only been one such case, but there have been more.

Mr. CANNON. But does not my friend think when he says that a pension agent who would not contribute more than half of his salary to political purposes was removed that it is only just and right to the country he should point out that pension agent so that he may be removed, and also who it was that compelled him to make that contribution for political purposes?

Mr. ROSECRANS. I do not think that would be the case just now, but the time will come when it will be proper to do so.

I have only to say in conclusion that on account of reducing expenditure, and giving, in my judgment, greater efficiency, avoiding, as it certainly does, corruption, at any rate removing the chance of such influence, I trust the proposition which I have submitted will meet with the favorable consideration of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania reserve the right to make the point of order against the amendment?

Mr. RANDALL. I did at first, until I could know what the amendment was, but now that I know what it is I do not, because I think it is not open to the point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. I renew the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. Under the practice the gentleman has the right so to do.

Mr. HISCOCK. It will be agreed on all hands, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment of the gentleman from California proposes general legislation of a very radical character. It changes existing law, and it does not seem clear it will decrease the amount of money carried by the bill. A result may be worked out, but it is impossible to say without looking all through the statutes and summing up the amount under one system and under the other that it does retrench expenditure. It certainly does not upon its face decrease the expenditure of the Government.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Does it not strike out the appropriation in the bill and provide that this service shall be done by Government officers who have to be paid anyhow?

Mr. HISCOCK. So far as that is concerned, I will say to the gentleman that we will call for a division of the question. But the gentleman will hardly contend no appropriation must be made for the preparation of vouchers even should his system be adopted. These expenses have to be provided for as well under his system as under any other. We will have to provide still for the payment of the expenses of the preparation of these vouchers.

Mr. ROSECRANS. If the gentleman will permit me, I will give him my answer at once so he may meet it. I have no idea such will have to be done.

Mr. HISCOCK. I insist it must be done, and I prophesy that every member of the Committee on Military Affairs except the chairman will agree with me on that point. The fact that these duties are to be discharged by paymasters on the retired-list will not render it unnecessary to have the assistance of a corps of clerks for the payment of which an appropriation will be necessary. It will not render the rent of offices unnecessary. All of these things, as a matter of course, will have to be appropriated for and they are not relieved by the amendment offered.

Now, so far as the amendment itself is concerned, so far as it strikes at the items covered by this bill, I make no point against it.

My point of order is made on that provision of the bill which transfers the duties of these officers to the Paymasters' Corps of the Army, or officers on the retired-list, and it is only to that feature of the amendment that I address my point of order and argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is that the proposition is not germane?

Mr. HISCOCK. The point of order is addressed to the provision of the amendment which transfers the duties of the pension agents to the paymasters and to men upon the retired-list. I say that the amendment is not germane to the bill, and that the provision of legislation does not reduce the amount of money covered by the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN. I want to call the attention of the House to a matter of fact, and as a matter of fact to show that the proposed change would not reduce expenditures. I find upon examination that there is no branch of the service where the disbursements are made so cheaply as in the payment of pensions. I find that the cost of disbursing the money to the pensioners is at the rate of $4.76 per thousand; while the cost of disbursing to the Army ranges from $25 to $30 per thousand, almost five times as much. One is by paymasters, the other by the proper machinery. I therefore can not see where the reduction of expenditures comes in.

Mr. ROSECRANS. The honorable gentleman from Minnesota seems to think that because the percentage of cost of disbursing moneys or paying troops by the paymasters of the Army is larger than the percentage of the cost of disbursing pension moneys, therefore it grows out of the use or employment of that kind of officers. That is not the case, at all. It is due to entirely different circumstances. The paymasters have to go around and pay the troops. They are the remnants of a large corps which once performed much more extensive duties than are now required of them. It is a corps for the reduction of which the law has itself provided, and for that purpose has prevented any more promotions being made in it.

It is to utilize that very separate force, which exists and which costs the Government money now, in this work that I propose the amendment; and it is a force which is to be reckoned in the cost of making payments to the Army. We want to utilize it. We want to substitute this force which we already have to pay for the agents of which I now speak. It can be done at less cost. That is a very plain proposition.

Now, my honorable friend from New York asked me a question to which I responded before I had his full idea. He asked me whether the voucher system which the law now requires would have to be continued in the event of the adoption of this amendment, and his object was to show that I was mistaken as to the fact that the adoption of this proposition would reduce expenditures. I replied that I did not expect the voucher system to continue, not knowing exactly what he meant, but remembering only that the paymasters of the United States Army pay the officers, or nearly all the officers, of the Army by checks. There is no charge for that, except the mere charge for the stationery required. He mentioned then that it would be necessary also that they should have offices. Yes, there would probably be some offices required and some office-rent to pay in addition; but I can tell the gentleman that there would be no necessity for eighteen, or twelve either, of these offices. I undertake to say more than that: that out of the number of officers who are disabled (paymasters) provision need not be made for probably more than four or five, because there are only four or five of these officers who could perform this service or whom the Paymaster-General considers eligible to put on that duty.

Now, if these were lieutenant-colonels it would be an addition of only $750 for each of the four, or $3,000 for the four, in addition to what is paid them now, while the four pension agents would cost $16,000. The paymasters at present not only receive salaries for their time but they have also clerks. There would be perhaps some additional clerks necessary if this change was made; I have no doubt of that; but if any man can make me believe that it is worth more than 5 cents apiece to make up these vouchers, or that it should be 10 or 15 cents, which used to be 30 cents, and that the smaller sum is not a sufficient compensation, he can do better than I think he can. I will take any good, competent clerk who is a rapid penman and he will readily earn $15 a day making out these vouchers at 5 cents each. I am not able to say how much the clerk-hire would be, or how much it would reduce the bill in that item, or how much it would be an increase over the clerk-hire for those now in actual service with the paymasters, but I have no doubt whatever that it would be very much less indeed than the amount now paid to the agents, and but a very little more than is now expended for these clerks of paymasters.

I think it is plain on the face of it that so long as we utilize these officers we will save on the present basis eighteen times $4,000, or $72,000 a year. On the basis of the bill of the committee which we are now considering the saving would be twelve times $4,000, or $48,000 of salary. We replace all that without the cost of one single cent. Or, if we allow for four officers taken from the retired-list, $3,000, it would be a saving of $45,000. It seems to me the objection of the gentleman from New York will not lie.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not want the Chair to misunderstand my point of order in this case. So far as the gentleman proposes to strike out the appropriation of money carried by this bill I make no objection. I make no point of order on the substitute so far as it does that. But the point I make is against that provision of the substitute which proposes to transfer to the Army officers, the paymasters, the discharge of the duties now performed by the pension agents.

I do not wish to repeat the argument. It is a mere matter of calculation for you to determine whether the effect of the substitute will be to decrease or to increase the amount of money to be expended. Certainly this legislation would not have the effect of reducing the amount covered by this bill. No gentleman will think this legislation of itself, pure and simple, would have the effect of lessening the amount covered by the bill.

I ask the question, wherein is the amendment germane to the bill? Here is a bill simply appropriating money. The transfer of duties from one officer to another it seems to me is in no way germane to an appropriation bill.

Mr. MATSON. The points of order which have been made against this bill heretofore by members of the Committee on Appropriations have been made upon the ground that the matters proposed by the various amendments were not matters which had been considered by the Committee on Appropriations. That ground cannot be taken here; because I think it is well known by every member of this House that the Committee on Appropriations went so far as to print a proposed matter of legislation in connection with this bill, of the most radical kind, providing the pensioner should be paid by checks direct from the Treasury Department; so that neither the gentleman from New York nor any member of the committee can say the Committee on Appropriations have not considered this matter in the most radical sense. The point of order, however, made by the gentleman from New York is that this amendment is not in order because it does not appear on the face of it to propose a reduction in public expenditures. The gentleman says that in order to determine that matter you have to make a mathematical calculation. I apprehend if any item in this bill was proposed to be amended by inserting a smaller sum, the Chair in determining the point of order on that would have to go into a matheematical calculation.

And I take it the chairman will take notice of what the law is as to the pay of officers of the Army. I do not pretend to say that the Chair will take notice of the fact that there are now supernumerary paymasters, paymasters who have no duties to perform, paymasters on the retired-list who are competent to perform these duties. But I say the Chair will take notice of the fact of the compensation of paymasters, and if this amendment proposes, as I understand it does, to provide that these paymasters discharge the duties of pension agents, the Chair can see at once without any intricate mathematical calculation that it does propose to reduce public expenditures to the amount of the salaries that are now paid to the pension agents, because the amendment proposes not to appoint new officers to the Pay Corps of the Army, but proposes that these officers now appointed and now paid by the Government shall take the place of these pension agents; so that the Chair will see at once the amount of reduction is the amount paid as salaries to these pension agents.

But the gentleman from New York says the proposition is not germane. Why is it not germane to this bill? It relates to the matter of paying pensions. It changes, of course, the officer. It supplies instead of one appointed as a pension agent an officer of the Army. But it relates to the subject-matter of the bill, which is the matter of the payment of pensions.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MATSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUMM. Has not the Secretary of War the right to discontinue the employment of paymasters at any time when they are not needed?

Mr. MATSON. I suppose Congress has the right to provide——

Mr. BRUMM. I ask whether the Department has not the right to do that without special law?

Mr. MATSON. To discontinue the employment of paymasters of the Army? I suppose not; the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who is more familiar with Army matters than I am, says it has not that power.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman say how they are appointed, from the line or how?

Mr. MATSON. These supernumerary paymasters, as I understand, are officers that have come down to us from the Pay Corps of the Army from the war.

Mr. BRUMM. Were they not appointed from civil life?

Mr. MATSON. I presume some of them were graduates from West Point and some were appointed from civil life.

Mr. BRUMM. They are not from the line?

Mr. ROSECRANS. Some are from the line too.

Mr. STEELE. They may be appointed from the line.

Mr. MATSON. I decline to yield to more than one gentleman at a time.

Mr. STEELE. I was proposing to give an answer to the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MATSON. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. BRUMM. I would like the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] to say whether he is positive that the Department may not at any time discontinue the employment of any paymasters whenever their services are no longer required?

Mr. MATSON. I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that the Secretary of War has no power to drop them from the roll of the Army. I will now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] for a question.

Mr. STEELE. I was going to answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. MATSON. I do not know that I have anything further to say.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. In regard to this change in the mode of paying pensioners, it does seem to me that the mistake has been in having pension agents at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to remind the gentleman that the question now before the committee is the point of order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I am aware of that fact, and I am going to speak to it. I say that the mistake seems to be that we have any pension agents at all, instead of having the Treasury Department to do the work, as it ought to do. The proposition of the gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS] is to substitute Army officers, now receiving salaries out of the public Treasury, in the place of pension agents, who receive not only the large salary of $4,000 a year but perquisites and not only perquisites in the way of so much for each voucher, but allowances for house-rent and contingent expenses of various kinds. The point of order is made that that is new legislation. I think that has been sufficiently answered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] who has just taken his seat.

The objection has been raised that this proposition will not reduce expenditures. I desire to address myself to that view of the case. As has been well said, these Army officers are already paid; these paymasters not only receive a salary, but they also are provided with clerks. There are at present eighteen pension agents, and there are about 18,000 pensioners on the average to be paid by each pension agent. The pensioners are not paid directly from the Treasury, as they ought to be, without the intervention of these pension agents, but they are paid through eighteen pension officers. These eighteen agents pay them four times a year.

The compensation of these agents is, first, a salary of $4,000 a year, then an allowance for vouchers, amounting on the average to $5,600 a year to each, and in addition to that an allowance for contingent expenses for fuel, light, &c. The proposition of the gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS] is a substitute for the paragraph, to which are pending two amendments—one by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] to make the payment for the vouchers 12 cents each, and the other by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] to make the payment for the vouchers 10 cents each.

The proposition of the gentleman from California is to employ Army officers, who are already paid salaries and provided with clerks, to do this work, instead of the twelve pension agents provided in this bill. Now, what would those pension agents get? At each one of these agencies there will be on the average 27,000 pensioners to be paid. For the first 4,000 pensioners each agent would receive $4,000, leaving 23,000 pensioners remaining. Those 23,000 pensioners are to be paid four times a year, and at the rate of 10 cents per voucher each pension agent would receive in addition to his salary $9,200 a year. In addition to that, the bill appropriates $10,000 for contingent expenses of pension agencies, or an average of $833 to each pension agent. That would make an average of $14,033 paid to each one of these twelve pension agents annually to do this work.

The proposition of the gentleman from California is to allow twelve paymasters of the Army to do this work. My opinion is that that is a good proposition. If you do that, then you will find that the next Congress will wipe out this whole pension-agent business entirely and permit the Treasury Department to send the check directly to the pensioner, as should be done now. The pension agent simply gives his personal check, when the pensioner ought to have the draft of the United States Treasury and he would then receive the money just as quickly as the pension agent now gets it.

It is no convenience to the pensioner to have these pension agents. They are simply men who have been put into these favored positions, and in some instances they abuse them. I will not take up the time of the committee now by showing how they do so; but if I were minded to do it I could show conclusively how the one in my State at least has abused his position ever since he held it, by running a paper and endeavoring to boost some man for some important position. That is but a part of the iniquitous system which we should get rid of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide the question of order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] makes the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS] is not germane to the subject-matter of the bill. The Chair believes no other point of order has been made against the proposition.

Mr. HISCOCK. I also made the point of order that the effect of the proposed legislation would not be to reduce the amount covered by the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the further point of order is made that the proposed amendment does not reduce expenditures.

The subject-matter of this bill is the payment of pensions. The paragraph under consideration appropriates $174,400 for the payment of the salaries of pension agents, fees for preparing vouchers, rent, fuel, light, postage, &c. The amendment proposes to strike out that appropriation entirely, and hence it will reduce the amount covered by the bill. On that ground, therefore, the amendment is in order as coming within the provision of the rule by reducing the amount carried by the bill.

As to the further point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill. The provisions of the bill relate to the payment of pensions and make appropriations therefor. It seems to the Chair that any amendment relating to the making of such payments would be in order. The mere fact that the amendment provides that one officer instead of another should make such payments does not necessarily make it subject to the rule. The Chair, therefore, is of opinion that the amendment is germane to the subject-matter of the bill, and for that reason also it is in order.

The time for debate on the pending amendment has been exhausted. The first question will be on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. CANNON. I desire at the proper time to be heard on the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. After the text of the bill has been perfected the Chair will submit the question on the substitute. The question is now upon the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] to strike out "12" in line 29 and insert "10."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the substitute proposed by the gentleman from California.

Mr. WASHBURN. Is it in order now to submit an amendment reducing the appropriation?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. WASHBURN. I move to amend by striking out "$174,400," in lines 25 and 26, and inserting "$24,800."

The amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the substitute of Mr. ROSECRANS.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire now to be heard for a moment touching the substitute of the gentleman from California. I believe that proposition should not be adopted. It proposes, as I understand, to throw upon the paymasters of the Army the duty of disbursing the money to the pensioners. I am not in favor of extending the duties of the Army. I am in favor of an army. It is necessary to have one; I am sorry it is. I never vote appropriations for it without regretting, looking at the subject from any standpoint, the necessity for an army.

But, in fact, an army is necessary. Perhaps our Army is about as small as it well can be—25,000 people, with the officers, paymasters, and the whole paraphernalia. Except so far as necessary to absolutely preserve the Government, to afford that element of force which the Government may require, I would not extend the duties or the powers of the Army one iota.

What is this proposition? To take the paymasters of the Army and throw upon them duties of a civil nature for which their trade does not peculiarly qualify them. The theory is that if a man is a good soldier he should be trained to the business; he should be set apart from other men, and should devote his talent, his time, his life to that specialty. In consideration of this he is assured under our law a fixed compensation which increases year by year; and when age comes upon him he is retired upon three-quarters pay, I believe.

I do not think the Army service is an economical service. Honorable I grant you it is, but economical it never was and never will be. For instance, how much do you suppose it costs to pay 25,000 people in the Army?

Mr. ROSECRANS. Will the gentleman state what was the percentage of cost for paying the Army during a time of war?

Mr. CANNON. I am speaking of it now in a time of peace.

Mr. ROSECRANS. If the expense is large it is owing to the very facts which we want now to remedy.

Mr. CANNON. There are 25,000 people in the Army to be paid; they are paid five times a year; and under the system of payment by these paymasters it actually costs to disburse to these 25,000 people their pay $23 on every $1,000; whereas to pay the 325,000 pensioners costs $4.60 on every $1,000 disbursed.

Now, I would like to know whether it is politic and proper to import into our system of paying pensions this expensive army machinery. I would retire more army officers, if you please; I would make more radical than it has been our legislation touching promotions, so that we could cut down the number of officers in the Army, and thereby reduce these expenses, rather than go hunting through the length and breadth of the land for some service outside of regular army service to which these military officers may be assigned. I say it is not republican; it is not economical. I do not think this Committee of the Whole will embark upon so radical an undertaking as this is.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I would like to say a word or two in reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman has offered the most specious and unsound argument I have ever heard him utter on this floor. He talks about the expensive army system, knowing full well that when the Pay Department had to pay the large number of troops which during the war it did pay, only a percentage of the cost of disbursement was incurred, way below the cost of paying the pension-roll as it is now. The gentleman knows that very well, and yet he talks about the expensive army system.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope the gentleman will state what that percentage was.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I have not the data.

Mr. HISCOCK. What is it in the Pension Office?

Mr. ROSECRANS. My recollection is it was much higher in the latter case. I have not the data at hand, but I have it in my committee-room, where these pay-officers preferred their petition, showing the amount of their disbursements and the cost of those disbursements by the Pay Department of the Army during the entire war, and it was a small fraction of percentage, I think one-third. Now we have the remnants of that Pay Corps. Through the goodness of Congress, instead of sweeping them out like old worn-out horses we have retained them; but under the provision of law we have stopped promotion in the corps until it has been reduced to forty.

We propose to take out of that redundant force which could pay 100,000 men as well as 25,000, and employ a few of them; I do not say it will be eighteen, and I do not say it will be twelve, but enough to make these pension disbursements, and the gentleman can not see there is any economy in such a proposition and he talks about this expensive army system.

Now, why should we not employ these men to do this work? The gentleman says they are not accustomed to civil service; that they have not been trained for this duty, and therefore they are not likely to be successful. That is a mere inference. During all their service in the Army their business has been to disburse funds in payment of troops, and I should like to inquire of any gentleman on this floor what particular quality there is in paying pensioners which is not like the general work of paying troops. I do not see anything why a man accustomed to pay troops could not with equal facility pay pensioners and keep his accounts with equal care and accuracy.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Where do you contemplate having these officers located?

Mr. ROSECRANS. My substitute provides that they shall be located at such points as shall be found best for the efficient performance of the work. They are to be under the regulations prepared by the Paymaster-General and Commissioner of Pensions, and approved by the President. The President of the United States is to be the judge in the matter, as he was the judge as to where these pension agencies should be located.

Mr. HANBACK. Does it provide for these paymasters giving a bond?

Mr. ROSECRANS. Paymasters have to give a bond every four years.

Mr. HANBACK. To what amount—only $20,000, I believe?

A MEMBER. On the retired-list?

Mr. ROSECRANS. On the retired-list or any other.

Mr. RANDALL. They are held by the bond of honor.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. The citizen's is just as good.

Mr. RANDALL. They may be court-martialed.

Mr. MAGINNIS. They give the heaviest bonds in proportion to the amount handled of any officers in the Government.

Mr. RYAN. Not on the retired-list.

Mr. RANDALL. They have a record for honesty and fidelity unsurpassed by any in any service.

Mr. HANCOCK. I think it is hardly possible to get a vote on this question to-night, as the substitute offered by the gentleman from California seems to be a very important one. I move, therefore, that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6094), making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

SIOUX INDIAN RESERVATION.

On motion of Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. 1755) to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE MR. HERNDON.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that as I was unavoidably absent from the House on last Saturday, the day fixed for the delivery of eulogies on the late Mr. HERNDON, of Alabama, I now ask consent to submit some remarks which I had prepared to deliver on that occasion.

There was no objection. [See Appendix.]

EDUCATIONAL BILL.

Mr. AIKEN. I am instructed by the Committee on Education to ask unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 398, for reference to that committee.

Mr. HISCOCK. I object.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1063) to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GEORGE P. WISE, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. DIBBLE, for three days, on account of important business.

FEES OF UNITED STATES MARSHALS, ATTORNEYS, AND CLERKS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement from the records of his Department showing the gross earnings per annum of each United States marshal, attorney, and clerk, the expense of his office, and net earnings which have been paid to him each year from the beginning of the fiscal year 1873 to the close of the fiscal year 1883; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, and ordered to be printed.

COLUMBIA HOSPITAL FOR WOMEN.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment, under the act of June 10, 1872, of Mr. BREWER, of New York, as a director for the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum, in place of Mr. HOLMAN, resigned.

CINCINNATI LAW LIBRARY.

Mr. JORDAN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the House joint resolution No. 224, granting certain publications to the Cincinnati law library, with a view to asking concurrence in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1, strike out the word "directed."
In line 2, strike out the words "and deliver."
In line 2, after the word "library," insert "if the same can be done without inconvenience from publications on hand belonging to the Government, and without cost to the Government."
In lines 3 and 4, strike out "circuit and district courts of the United States."
In line 6, after the word "annals," insert "and debates."
Strike out, after the word "representatives," in line 8, down to and including the word "Department," in line 9, and insert "and to enable him to comply with this resolution he is authorized to call upon and receive from any Department or office any of such books."
In line 10, after the word "Government," insert "but no purchase of any of said books shall be made at the expense of the United States."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. JORDAN. I move to concur in all the Senate amendments.

The amendments of the Senate were agreed to.

Mr. JORDAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. COX, of North Carolina (at 5 o'clock p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BELMONT: Petition of the teachers and 125 students of the Cooper Union, New York city, for the removal of duty on works of art and the passage of the Belmont bill for that purpose—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CARLETON: Resolutions of the Michigan State board of health, in favor of the bill pending providing for a quarantine against the introduction of infectious diseases—to the Select Committee on the Public Health.

Also, a petition from Baxter Springs Post, Grand Army of the Republic, relative to a national cemetery—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition from soldiers of Johnson County, Iowa, asking for an appropriation for a soldiers' home—to the same committee.

Also, petition from Vinton Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Iowa, relating to the recommendations of the committee of the Grand Army of the Republic—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 18, 1884.

Prayer by Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D., of Washington city.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. PLATT. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. ALLISON. I think that motion had better be postponed for a little while, so as to see how we get on to-day. We want to finish the Post-Office appropriation bill to-day if we can.

Mr. PLATT. At the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations I can hardly do less than withdraw the motion for the present, but I should hope that the Senate would adjourn over until Monday under any circumstances.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the motion lie over for the time being.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

SAINT CROIX RIVER BRIDGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill received yesterday from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 6538) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Saint Croix River, in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. SAWYER. That is a precise copy of the Senate bill which passed the Senate the other day. I have examined it and have talked with the members of the Committee on Commerce in relation to it. Every word in it is exactly like the bill that passed the Senate, except that it is marked a House bill and the number is changed. I should like to have it considered and put on its passage now. I do not understand why it was mixed up in the other House and sent back in that form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reported for information.

Mr. HARRISON. I was going to ask to have it reported for information.

Mr. SAWYER. It is a bill that passed the Senate in precisely the same language it is now, and instead of the House passing the Senate bill, by some means or other they passed a House bill like the Senate bill. I have examined both bills thoroughly, and there is not a word of change in this from the bill that passed the Senate except that it is marked "House of Representatives" and has a different number. The people concerned are in somewhat of a hurry to build the bridge.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not understand yet what the bill is about.

Mr. SAWYER. It is to build a bridge across the Saint Croix River.

Mr. FRYE. The bill is all right.

The bill was read the second time at length; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting, in compliance with the requirements of the act of Congress approved March 17, 1882, information in relation to the claim of Grafton Munroe, postmaster at Annapolis, Md., for reimbursement of losses by burglary on February 4, 1884; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a communication from W. W. Corcoran, chairman of the joint committee on the Washington Monument, transmitting certain resolutions adopted by the Washington National Monument Society, April 3, 1884, relating to the approaching completion of the Washington Monument and the appropriate dedication of the same; which, on motion of Mr. MORRILL, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CALL presented a petition of citizens of Key West, Fla., praying Congress to pass an act for the relief of Messrs. Leidenberg & Co., cigar manufacturers, of Key West, Fla., from a judgment obtained by the United States against them; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of land-owners in Putnam County, Florida, praying for an act of Congress making an appropriation for a resurvey of township 12 south, range 27 east, in Putnam County, Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of Henry W. Cressy Post, No. 42, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Wisconsin, indorsing the recommendations in regard to pensions made by the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Edward Kelly, late private Company B, Thirty-ninth Massachusetts Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONGER presented the memorial of George Willard and Joseph Saunders, of Battle Creek, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of the news-copyright bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a memorial of citizens of Louisville, Ky., remonstrating against the discrimination now made in Army and Navy appointments between different schools of medicine; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONAS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2033) providing for a writ of error in the cause of the heirs of Arredondo against the United States of America, in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Florida, reported it with amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on the Library to report adversely the bill (S. 1728) giving copyright to newspapers. I ask that it be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 43) for the erection of a bronze equestrian statue to Simon Bolivar in the city of Washington, reported adversely thereon, and the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, to enable the Joint Committee on the Library to purchase the painting of the Electoral Commission of 1877, by Mrs. C. Adele Fassett, and appropriating $15,000 for that purpose; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1621) for the relief of Saint Luke's Protestant Episcopal church, in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1647) to establish a chaplaincy of the jail and the institutions of charity and reform in the District of Columbia, to report it adversely, with a statement that the committee has been advised that all these institutions have religious exercises under the auspices of the various Christian associations here, and they are better attended to in that regard without an established chaplaincy than with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be indefinitely postponed, if there be no objection.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I should not like to make that motion. I prefer that it should go on the Calendar, in view of the fact that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], who is the patron of the bill, is not here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

REPORT ON ALASKA.

Mr. HARRISON. I am instructed by the Committee on Territories to report back favorably a resolution directing the Secretary of War to transmit to the Senate the report of Lieutenant Schwatka of his reconnaissance from Chilkaht Inlet, Alaska, to Fort Selkirk, on Yukon River, Alaska, and I ask that it be put upon its passage.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate the official report by Lieut. Frederick Schwatka, United States Army, of his military reconnaissance of 1883 from Chilkaht Inlet, Alaska, to Fort Selkirk, on Yukon River, Alaska.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HILL introduced a bill (S. 2062) to provide for the deposit in the Treasury of the receipts of the money-order system and for the payment of its expenses out of appropriations; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 2063) for the relief of Winifred B. Coffin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 2064) for the repair of Fort Marion, at Saint Augustine, Fla., and the inclosure of the grounds attached to said fort; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2065) for the establishment of certain life-saving stations on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2066) providing for a resurvey of township 12 south, of range 27 east, in Putnam County, Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GROOME (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2067) for the relief of Horace J. Gambrill; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BOWEN introduced a bill (S. 2068) to increase the pension of William Baldwin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 2069) for the relief of Eugene C. Johnson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2070) for the relief of Charles Pealey, of New York; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORRILL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2071) for the relief of Frank A. Page; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 79) for the relief of M. D. Ball; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CALL, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Basil Moreland be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims, there being no adverse report.

CHANGES IN ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas it is provided in section 7 of article 1 of the Constitution that "every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States, and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill:" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be requested to examine and report to the Senate its judgment as to whether or not it is competent for the two Houses of Congress to authorize or direct any change to be made in the enrollment of a bill or resolution by concurrent resolution, or other mode not involving presentation to the President, or amendment and re-enactment.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 224) granting certain publications to the Cincinnati law library.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 1063) to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read for amendment by paragraphs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the bill be read as in Committee of the Whole for amendment, item by item, and that the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations be considered as the reading proceeds. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PLUMB. In view of the lateness in the week and the hope I have that the bill may be passed to-day, I shall not detain the Senate at any length in presenting the general features of the bill as reported from the committee.

The appropriations for the postal service are the only ones which are returned to the Treasury by the people. It is the only service under this Government which the people themselves pay for directly. So that while this is nominally an appropriation from the Treasury, it is in reality but a pledge of future revenues of the postal service to be paid in by the people who make use of the Department for the carrying of their mail.

The Government being thus practically the trustee of these revenues for a specific purpose, the first thing to be provided is that the service shall fully answer the purpose of those who keep it up. Not that there should not be economy, but that the economy should not only not impair the efficiency of the service, but it should not suggest even the possibility of such impairment.

The postal service has largely increased in the last few years and in a much greater proportion than the increase of population, for while population has increased about 2½ per cent. per annum the postal revenue representing an equal of the service has increased an average of over 10 per cent. during the past six years, and seems likely to increase at a greater ratio in the future.

While expenses have nearly kept pace with receipts it must be borne in mind that the character of the service has greatly changed and its efficiency and frequency marvelously increased; the weekly and semi-weekly horseback and stage service of four and six miles an hour giving way to seven times a week of the double daily carried on railroad trains at a speed of twenty and forty miles an hour. In addition the system of railway post-offices whereby the mails are distributed on morning trains, avoiding the old system of deposit in connecting offices for distribution at leisure, insures the delivery of letters and papers with all the celerity and certainty of passenger travel.

The bill as sent to the Senate from the House, in the opinion of the Appropriations Committee, did not make a suitable provision for the service for the coming year. One embarrassment, however, exists in regard to determining what is necessary, and that is that there are no official data to be had for the present year upon which can be based estimates either of expenditures or revenues for the succeeding year. It is a somewhat singular fact that in the report of the Postmaster-General dated November 19 last, and presented to Congress at the opening of the present session, there is not a single syllable of any kind or description whatever referring to the service for the fiscal year 1884. We are treated to the results of the service for 1883 and speculations are indulged in with reference to the service for 1885, leaving an absolute hiatus of the entire fiscal year 1884, which the committee must deal with as best they can without aid from the Department, except such as they may get by special inquiry.

This results largely from the method of accounting provided under the law, quarterly returns only being required to be made by the different postmasters, and therefore the Department has not at its command, in the regular, orderly, and ordinary methods of business, the data upon which to make estimates for that portion of the year to succeed the rendition of the report. And still this does not wholly excuse the absence of reference to and publication of the returns for the first quarter of the fiscal year and which had expired fifty days prior to the date of the annual report, nor of the failure to furnish data afterward received to Congress, together with deductions therefrom, to aid in the preparation of the annual appropriation bill.

In a report on foreign and domestic postal accounting, made by James T. Smith, chief of division in the office of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, reference is made to this subject in the following words:

With quarterly accounting the Postmaster-General can not be informed of the receipts and disbursements for the first half of the fiscal year until the last quarter has commenced and the liabilities under his control for the entire year have therefore been incurred. With monthly accounting he could be advised of the revenues and expenditures within thirty days from the expiration of each month.

The suggestion is an important one; but the Postmaster-General can now require reports at such intervals as may be necessary in addition to those required by law and which were at hand when his annual report was made up.

This not having been done, and the Department system of keeping accounts being otherwise defective, the committee has been left largely to estimates formed from fragmentary and insufficient data as to expenditures and revenues for the fiscal year 1884. They have been aided by the newspapers, which seem to have been able to get valuable information not accessible to the committee.

The embarrassment in this regard is the greater because letter postage was changed on the 1st of last October from 3 cents to 2 cents. The effect of that was variously estimated in advance of its adoption, and there is now a great deal of speculation in regard to what the result has been and will be. The Department decline to furnish any estimates as to the results of the change except of the most general character, and in fact as to any results flowing from it except upon the total revenue, and these are qualified by the possibility of other elements entering into them which are not disclosed or hinted at. The question, therefore, as to whether the 2-cent postage has increased the number of sealed letters sent, whether it has displaced postal cards, is, as I said, largely a matter of conjecture; but from the best information to be obtained the committee believe that the increase in the number of sealed letters transmitted during the fiscal year 1884 will be at least 20 per cent. greater than during fiscal year preceding. Allowing 10 per cent. as the natural increase, which is the average for the last three years, this would make an increase of 10 per cent. in the number of sealed letters sent over and above what might have been expected if the 3-cent postage had continued. It was part of the expectation of the committee presented to Congress at the time of the adoption of the 2-cent rate that one of the results would be to displace measurably the use of postal cards and of unsealed envelopes covering circulars, &c. This anticipation is believed to have been fully realized, and the further anticipation that the change to 2-cent postage would result in but a slight deficiency would also have been realized but for the after-passage of a bill increasing largely the compensation of postmasters, which increased expenditures for the year over $2,500,000.

The official estimates of revenue for the year 1884 were $50,670,456; the estimates of expenditures were $46,741,111.25. The appropriations for this year were $44,489,520. The estimated surplus revenue was $3,929,345. The returns for the last quarter of 1883 and the 1st quarter of 1884, both under the 3-cent rate, show that the estimate of revenue was about $1,000,000 too great, and that if 3-cent postage had continued the amount of surplus revenue would have been a little less than $3,000,000 in place of a little less than $4,000,000, as estimated The substitution of 2-cent for the 3-cent postage, occurring on the 1st day of October last, will reduce the revenue below the amount estimated by the Department nearly $7,000,000. So far as there are any data which the committee has been able to make available, it will be about $43,785,000, including $400,000 of revenue from money-order business, while the expenses will be about $47,000,000.

These expenses include an item of about $1,400,000 addition to postmasters' salaries made by the act of March 3, 1883 (the addition being the amount of increase between passage of act and October 1 following), which was not in contemplation at the time of the reduction of postage or at date of estimate, and probably $1,000,000 more was added to salaries of postmasters for remainder of the year by the general increase. It is probably generally known that the act of 1883, which was designed to adjust the salaries of postmasters to the new rate of postage provided, was by an oversight made to take effect on its passage instead of on the 1st day of October. This fact alone accounts for the $1,400,000 above mentioned. The act increased the percentage which postmasters were entitled to withhold on account of salaries in anticipation of the reduction of postage, and took effect while the old rate of postage was still in force. It also added somewhat to the salaries of postmasters for the period following, that is to say, for the future. I quote now from the debate in the other House:

> Under the old law postmasters of the fourth class receive as compensation 60 per cent. on the first $100 of receipts of their offices, 50 per cent. on the next $200, and 40 per cent. on the balance. Under the new law the postmasters receive as compensation 100 per cent. on the first $50 per quarter of receipts of their offices, 60 per cent. on the next $100, 50 per cent. on the next $200, and 40 per cent. on all in excess of $350.
> Under this new law every postmaster the receipts of whose office amounts to $250 per quarter will receive as compensation $160 per quarter; under the old law he would receive only $130 per quarter. There is at once a difference of $30 in favor of the postmasters under the new law. Again, under the new law every postmaster whose receipts are less that $50 per quarter gets the whole of it as compensation. There are in the United States over 30,000 offices where the receipts are less than $200. Suppose they averaged only $100; there is a difference at once of $1,200,000 which these little postmasters will get whose receipts are less than $50 per quarter more than they would receive under the old law.

The element, therefore, of the increase of salaries of postmasters was not taken into account, because not anticipated by the committee, when reporting in favor of establishing the new rate of postage.

The estimate for the coming fiscal year made by the Postmaster General for the expenses of the Department are $50,062,189.60. The revenues estimated are $47,104,078.31. The amount of the bill as passed by the House was $46,225,900. The Senate Committee on Appropriations have added to that $3,499,500, making the amount of the bill as reported to the Senate $49,725,400. Estimates based upon known facts concerning the revenues for this year make it tolerably certain that the revenues for 1885 will exceed the estimates of the Department about $1,000,000, making the revenues for 1885 something over $48,000,000, which will leave, if the bill shall be passed as it came from the hands of the Senate committee, about $1,700,000 of a deficit to be provided for out of the general revenues.

In the increase which the committee have found necessary to add to the bill as it came from the House there has been simply a determination to give to the people that character of service which is required by the necessities of the situation and which they are entitled to, not only because of the general interests involved, but by reason of the fact that they themselves pay the burden, whatever it may be, for this service, and desire, first of all, it shall be good and constantly made better so far as possible.

Much of the increase is made necessary by the condition of the law, which the committee did not feel it incumbent on them to change. Take, for instance, the item of salaries of postmasters. They are provided for by law, and by a law passed so recently as March a year ago. Under that law, as under all the laws which have been in existence on that subject for a long time, the postmasters retain the amount of their salaries out of the revenues of their offices, transmitting only the remainder to the Department. Therefore any reduction in that amount in this bill would not operate to reduce the sum to be actually paid as salaries, but would be a nominal reduction merely. So in reference to the item for railway mail transportation, unless the law under which it is to be paid is to be changed. The House committee proposed to reduce the general compensation for railways 5 per cent.; in addition to that it was proposed to reduce the compensation of the land-grant railroads 50 per cent., and also to reduce the compensation of the Union and Central Pacific roads 50 per cent.

The bill as reported by the Senate Committee on Appropriations is, according to the belief of the committee, within rather than without the necessities of the situation. In some cases the amounts are not so large as the committee believe they should be and are not as large as the estimates of the Department; and it may be said for these estimates running back over a period of ten or fifteen years that careful examination shows that the estimates of expenditures made by the Department have rarely varied to any considerable extent. So it may be assumed that unless the law is changed the expenditures will be what the estimates call for, whether we appropriate for them or not. That would not be true of the item for railway postal clerks nor of the item for clerks in post offices, but both these items represent expenditures for useful and necessary purposes and in which the convenience of the entire community is more concerned than in almost any other portion of the appropriations, because they have to do with the speedy and effective transmission and delivery of the mails, and any shortening of the appropriations in this particular would result injuriously to the service.

I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a tabular statement showing in detail the items of increase, which need not be read unless called for.

The statement is as follows:

Mr. PLUMB. I now ask the Secretary to read the bill for amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in the appropriations for the "Office of the Postmaster-General," after the word "dollars," in line 12, to insert "and of this sum $3,000 shall be paid the chief post-office inspector; and post-office inspectors shall be allowed $4 per day, in lieu of the charges now permitted, for personal expenses;" so as to make the clause read:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL.—For mail depredations and post-office inspectors, including amounts necessary for fees to United States marshals and attorneys, $200,000; and of this sum $3,000 shall be paid the chief post-office inspector; and post-office inspectors shall be allowed $4 per day, in lieu of the charges now permitted, for personal expenses; and not exceeding $5,000 of this amount may be expended for fees to United States attorneys, marshals, clerks of courts, and counsel necessarily employed by post-office inspectors of the Post-Office Department, subject to approval by the Attorney-General.

Mr. PLUMB. In regard to the first part of the amendment, that $3,000 shall be allowed the chief post-office inspector, that is simply a repetition of the law of last year, which seems to have been left out by the House. The inspectors below the chief inspector receive $2,500, and Congress last year made the salary of the chief inspector $3,000.

The item of $4 per day for post-office inspectors is in lieu of expenses. Heretofore, and until a very recent period, the Department has been in the habit of allowing the respective inspectors, for the purpose of obviating the necessity of making up itemized accounts, the sum of $5 a day to cover the expenses of travel. Under a recent order of the Postmaster-General this practice has been stopped, and inspectors required to furnish itemized accounts. This has been found in practice to be exceedingly burdensome and in many ways objectionable, and the committee have adopted the rule which prevails in the Interior Department of giving a gross sum, which is within rather than without the amount necessary for this purpose.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The allowance here is $4 per day "in lieu of the charges now permitted for personal expenses." I should like to know whether that applies to every day in the year.

Mr. PLUMB. No; only the days that they are on duty away from their ordinary stations.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Why not say so?

Mr. PLUMB. The only trouble about that is that we did not care to deal with the question in a new way except to substitute a gross sum for itemized accounts. We think it better to stand on the law which now exists, that they shall receive expenses when absent on duty and which has received construction, and simply say they shall receive $4 a day in lieu of all charges. We do not run any risk in that respect.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As I am not satisfied but that an inspector may be entitled under the law to $4 a day for the time that he is an inspector, I should like to have that guarded against. I do not know that they would make such a claim, but they may.

Mr. PLUMB. Inasmuch as the words of the existing statute are as I stated, they can not go beyond that. The committee thought of putting in there "while on service," but sometimes it happens that the inspectors are required to stop a day or two to examine a post-office and their expenses go on just the same as while they are traveling. So it was deemed best for protection of the Government to simply put this $4 a day in to cover the same range of charges which are now covered by the practice and by the law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in the appropriation for the "Office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General," in line 25, to increase the item "for compensation to postmasters" from $10,500,000 to $11,750,000.

Mr. PLUMB. The amount which will be necessary to discharge the obligations to postmasters for the present year, taking the fourth quarter of 1883 and the first quarter of 1884, of which returns have been received, as samples, will be $11,243,203.68. This only adds, therefore, about $500,000 for the year 1885 beyond that which is necessary for the year 1884, and the committee believe it is, if anything, too small, but it is thought best to fix that sum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 29, to increase the appropriation "for compensation to clerks in post-offices" from $4,775,000 to $4,900,000.

Mr. PLUMB. I want to call attention to that item, because it is an item which has been made the subject of considerable discussion elsewhere. I ask for the reading of the paragraphs from the letter of the First Assistant Postmaster-General under the subtitle of clerk-hire, which I send to the desk.

The Secretary read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
SALARY AND ALLOWANCE DIVISION,
Washington, D. C., April 10, 1884.

SIR: In response to your verbal request for further information relative to the estimates made by this office for clerk-hire, rent, fuel and light, furniture, and miscellaneous items, for the coming fiscal year, I have the honor to make the following statement, which, for convenience and brevity, I shall classify under the heads as above indicated.

CLERK-HIRE.

The appropriation for clerks in post-offices for the present fiscal year is $4,775,000, and the estimate made by this Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, is $4,900,000, an increase of $125,000, or 2.6 per cent., over the appropriation for the present fiscal year.

This estimate was made after a careful consideration of the best data obtainable at the time, October 1, 1883, and upon the basis of the experience of the Department in dealing with this important subject during the past few years, and the known increase of postal business, as shown by a tabulated statement of the increase of revenue at one hundred representative post-offices, covering nearly every State and Territory of the Union, for the four quarters ended June 30, 1883. This table, which is printed on pages 63 and 64 of the report of the Postmaster-General for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883, shows an aggregate increase of revenue for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883, at the one hundred offices named of $2,229,006, or an average of 24.32 per cent. for each office.

This increase of revenue is a showing made upon a full year at the old or 3-cent rate, but the best information obtainable at this time shows that there will not be a very material reduction occasioned by the new or 2-cent rate. Indeed, the best estimates that can now be made show an increase of the letter mail of about 20 per cent., which, of course, will largely increase the work of the postal clerks throughout the country.

To provide for this increase and the natural growth of the service I am of the opinion that even with the Department estimate of $125,000 this office will be unable to meet the reasonable demands for clerks in post-offices during the coming fiscal year, and if the amount as fixed by the House is approved the Department will be seriously embarrassed in its effort to maintain an efficient postal service.

The bill as passed by the House appropriates $4,775,000, being the exact amount allowed for the present fiscal year. This action ignores the wonderful increase of postal business, as well as the fact that the aggregate of allowances for clerk-hire made from time to time will at the close of the fiscal year largely exceed the appropriation made for that year. For example, an allowance made in the sum of $2,000 to take effect, say, January 1, 1884, will be chargeable to the appropriation for the present fiscal year for the six months ending June 30, 1884, or just one-half of the amount, $1,000; while the full amount, $2,000, would be chargeable to the appropriation for the new fiscal year, unless the allowance was adjusted and reduced. But as allowances are being constantly reviewed and adjusted to correspond with the business at the respective offices, it is not the practice of this office to adjust all allowances at the beginning of the fiscal year.

For the reason stated, as illustrated by the above example, the aggregate allowances for clerks in post-offices at the close of the present year will exceed the amount as fixed by the House in round numbers by $90,000. It is therefore evident that the estimate of the Department is a very moderate one.

As I have heretofore stated (report of the Postmaster-General for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, page 96), no other fund is so closely identified with the interests of the public. As this appropriation is increased or limited, the mails are handled with greater or less dispatch and efficiency, and to apportion this fund properly, giving needed relief, temporary or permanent, as the service demands, requires constant care and watchfulness.

As an evidence of this care and watchfulness I will here insert a tabulated statement showing the equitable apportionment of allowances for clerical assistance at separating post-offices, or offices where mail is distributed for other post-offices, from July 1, 1883, to the present time, namely:

Date.	Number of separating post-offices.			Aggregate amount allowed for separating clerks.	Average allowance for each office.
	Number of separating post-offices.	Increase from last date.	Total increase of post-offices to date.
July 1, 1883	1,633	333	333	$320,572	$196 31
October 13, 1883	1,732	99	432	388,160	224 11
December 10, 1883	1,864	132	564	454,816	244 00
March 1, 1884	2,108	244	808	515,030	244 32
March 18, 1884	2,244	136	944	545,290	243 00
April 3, 1884	2,268	24	968	552,084	243 42
April 4, 1884	2,273	5	973	553,572	243 54
April 9, 1884	2,273	0	973	553,772	243 63

This table shows that the number of separating offices July 1, 1883, was 1,633, and the average allowance for clerk-hire for each office was $196.31. The number of separating offices at present, April 10, 1884, is 2,273, or an increase of 640 offices, and the average allowance per office is $243.63. It will be observed that since December 10, 1883, 409 additional separating offices have been made, while the average allowance per office is practically the same, showing a very equitable apportionment of the fund.

Pertinent to this branch of the subject, your attention is invited to my views relative to separating clerks, on pages 96 and 97 of the report of the Postmaster-General for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883.

Relative to the allowances for clerks in the larger post-offices, I desire to call your attention to the following tabulated statement, showing the number of clerks, the total compensation allowed for clerk-hire, and the average salary of clerks at the nine offices named, namely:

Statement showing the number of clerks, allowance for clerk-hire, and the average compensation of clerks at nine of the larger post-offices.

Office.	Number of clerks in office.	Total allowance for clerks.	Average compensation for clerks.
New York, N. Y.	857	$804,739	$939
Chicago, Ill.	426	386,545	907
Philadelphia, Pa.	348	266,915	767
Boston, Mass.	296	254,325	859
Saint Louis, Mo.	183	150,500	822
Washington, D. C.	183	146,580	801
Cincinnati, Ohio	129	115,575	896
Balitmore, Md.	106	96,750	913
San Francisco, Cal.	88	102,180	1,161

As near as I can estimate, from a careful examination of the records, postmasters are now paying out of their own funds about $160,000 for clerical assistance. About $76,000 of this amount is paid by postmasters at first and second class offices, and the balance by postmasters at separating offices or third and fourth class offices.

Very respectfully,

FRANK HATTON,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas whether that letter applies also to the compensation to postmasters, which is increased largely. There was a communication in that regard which I think it would be well without reading to make part of the RECORD.

Mr. PLUMB. I have made the statement of what the revenues were last year, and I will also insert the letter of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department on that subject.

Mr. BECK. I think that would be well, because that is a large increase, but a necessary one.

Mr. PLUMB. I am obliged to the Senator for calling my attention to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The letter referred to is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF THE TREASURY
FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., April 1, 1884.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 29th ultimo, I have the honor to inform you that the amount of postal revenues collected by postmasters during the quarter ended December 31, 1883, is $11,146,654.46, and the amount allowed as compensation for the same period is $2,742,000.90. Both of these amounts may be changed slightly when all corrections and errors are posted to the general accounts.

By reason of the change in the rate of postages which took effect October 1, 1883, stocks of stamps in private hands were depleted prior to that date and replenished immediately thereafter. The result was an unusually large sale of stamps in the quarter ended December 31, offsetting largely the decrease in the value of the stamp. This, however, can not be expected to continue, and the returns for the March quarter, when in, should, unless other causes have operated to increase the revenue, show a large falling off in revenue. As, however, this unusual sale of stamps would not affect the quantity of matter passing through the mails, and as compensation to fourth-class postmasters is based upon the value of stamps affixed to such matter, to which is added the fixed salaries paid Presidential postmasters, the amount required to pay compensation to postmasters for the March quarter can be approximated by adding to the amount ascertained for the previous quarter 5 per cent. thereof, the usual increase.

This would show the amount of compensation for the six months to be as follows:

Fourth quarter 1883	$2,742,000 90
First quarter 1884	2,879,100 94

Respectfully,

J. H. ELA, Auditor.

Hon. P. B. PLUMB,
United States Senate.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 31, to increase the appropriation "for payment to letter-carriers and the incidental expenses of the free-delivery system" from $3,600,000 to $4,000,000.

Mr. PLUMB. The amount appropriated last year for this purpose was $3,500,000. The estimate for the present year as found in the Book of Estimates is $3,800,000. The Postmaster-General, however, sent to the House on the 12th of February a letter on this subject which I ask the Secretary to read, and I also ask him to read the letter of the superintendent of the free-delivery system.

The Secretary read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., February 12, 1884.

SIR: I find, on referring to my annual report for 1883, page 59, that in stating the amount which will be required for the free-delivery service for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1884, two important items were omitted, namely, $180,000 for additional letter-carriers in cities where the service is now in operation and $20,000 for additional incidental expenses, making $200,000.

I therefore advise that the estimate for this service for the next fiscal year be increased from $3,800,000 to $4,000,000.

The considerations which lead me to ask for this large amount are as follows: This service has been extended within about a year to forty-seven additional cities, making the present number one hundred and fifty-nine. These cities have an aggregate population according to the census of 1880 of about 10,000,000, and employ 3,888 carriers at the present time. They yielded last year one-half of the gross revenue of the Department, and from postage on local matter alone $1,021,594 in excess of the total cost of this branch of the service. The amount required is also largely increased by the act of August 2, 1882, increasing the pay of auxiliary carriers from $400 to $600 per annum, and requiring the promotion of carriers to the next higher grade after one year's service, involving an increased expense in each individual case of $200 in the first-class free-delivery cities and $250 in the second-class cities. The percentum of increase in the cost of the service for the fiscal year was 4.93, against 20.95 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, this large increase being due in great part to the act above cited.

I therefore recommend the appropriation of $4,000,000 as the probable cost of the service for the next fiscal year.

Very respectfully,

W. Q. GRESHAM, Postmaster-General.

Hon. S. J. RANDALL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., February 11, 1884.

SIR: I desire to submit for the consideration of the Committee on Appropriations that, according to the best estimate that can be made up to this time, the appropriation for the free-delivery service for the current fiscal year will be exceeded at the close of the year by a small sum.

To meet this anticipated deficiency, I request that the amount left over from the appropriation of the last fiscal year, namely, $26,663.49, be appropriated for use during the remainder of this fiscal year.

I beg leave to state in this connection that Congress at its last session appropriated for this service $100,000 less than the estimate submitted, and hence the danger of a deficiency.

Very respectfully,

W. Q. GRESHAM, Postmaster-General.

Hon. S. J. RANDALL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations House of Representatives.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 1, 1884.

SIR: I submit herewith for your consideration a revised estimate of the cost of the free-delivery service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885.

It is proper to state, as bearing on this subject, that this service is now in operation in 159 of the largest cities in the country, employing 3,888 carriers, and aggregating a population of 10,000,000 under the census of 1880, who are directly interested in it, besides other millions who, having correspondence with these cities, are likewise interested in it.

That this branch of the service during the last fiscal year yielded $1,021,894 from local matter alone in excess of the cost of the service.

That the total revenues of the Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, amounted to $45,508,692, of which amount $22,317,499 was derived from the free-delivery offices—one-half.

That the large estimate is due in great part to the act of August 2, 1882, changing the pay of all auxiliary carriers from $400 to $600 per annum, and requiring the promotion of carriers to the next higher grade after one year's service, involving an expense in each individual case of $200 in the first-class free-delivery cities and $250 in the second class.

That the percentage of increase of the service for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1882, was 4.93; whereas it was 20.96 for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883, this large increase in the cost being attributable mainly to the act of August 2, 1882.

It will be observed that the expense of the service is shown in comparison with the postage derived from local matter alone, which is estimated at about 25 per cent. of the whole matter delivered by carriers—no credit being given to matter received by mail and delivered by carriers.

In view of the above considerations, the service can not, in my judgment, be kept up to a commendable state of efficiency, and extended to additional cities as the law authorizes, for a less sum than the estimate herewith submitted, $4,000,000.

Very respectfully,

R. W. GURLEY,
Superintendent Free-Delivery System.

Hon. FRANK HATTON,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Pay of 1,985 carriers, at $1,000 each	$1,985,000
Pay of 891 carriers, at $850 each	757,350
Pay of 367 carriers, at $800 each	293,600
Pay of 645 carriers, at $600 each	387,000
3,888	3,422,950

These estimates were made January 15, 1884, at present rates, which are changing every day by promotions.

For promotion, 1,012 carriers	$220,000
For additional carriers, say $300 to $600 each, which is less than an average of two to each of 159 offices	180,000
For estimated service in additional cities (21 now on file)	50,000
For incidentals, including three inspectors ($9,000)	130,000
	4,002,950

Mr. PLUMB. Unless this appropriation is increased there will not be money enough even to pay the existing force, while there has been a rather large number of cities which have already applied for the extension of this free-delivery system to them and which will also have to be wholly omitted. This increased appropriation only represents the natural and inevitable increase in the free-delivery system if it is to be applied under the law as now existing. The law admits any town having a population of 20,000 or a gross revenue from the postal service of $20,000 to have the free-delivery service extended to it. I ask that a table connected with this matter be inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOAR in the chair). The table referred to by the Senator from Kansas will be printed in the RECORD, there being no objection.

The table is as follows:

List of cities applying for free delivery.

Cities.	Population, 1880.	Revenue, 1883.
Decatur, Ill	9,547	$30,027
Fargo, Dak	—,693	30,288

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out the following proviso from lines 37 to 40, inclusive:

Provided, That periodical publications, other than daily newspapers, when delivered within the city wherein they are published, shall be charged with the same postage as is now or may be imposed by law upon such publications when delivered elsewhere than in the city of publication.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Secretary to read a letter from the First Assistant Postmaster-General on the subject of that proviso.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the letter be inserted in the RECORD?

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., April 14, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to state, before replying to your oral request for an explanation of the proviso in the Post-Office appropriation bill (H. R. 5459), on page 2, lines 31 to 35 inclusive, that, "Under the proviso of section 239, Postal Laws and Regulations, the postage on newspapers (excepting weeklies) and periodicals, deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers, is as follows: 1. On newspapers (excepting weeklies, for the rate on which see division 4 of this ruling), whether regular or transient, and without regard to weight or frequency of issue, 1 cent each, to be prepaid by affixing ordinary 1-cent stamps to each paper. 2. On periodicals (other than newspapers), whether regular or transient, not exceeding two ounces in weight, 1 cent each, to be prepaid by affixing an ordinary 1-cent stamp to each paper. 3. On periodicals (other than newspapers), whether regular or transient, exceeding two ounces in weight, 2 cents each, by affixing ordinary 2-cent stamps to each paper. 4. Weekly newspapers, entitled to second-class rates, excepted above, to regular subscribers, 2 cents per pound, to be weighed in bulk and prepaid, with newspaper and periodical stamps at the office of mailing."—United States Postal Guide for January, 1884, page 488.

These are the present rates for second-class publications, deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers, and, being specific and higher than the general rates, were evidently intended to help pay for this service in part, and mainly to prevent the throwing on the carriers of large quantities of matter of this class.

The proviso in House bill 5459 is evidently intended to reduce these special rates to the lower and general rates affecting this class of matter.

I will add that the Department did not recommend the proviso under consideration, as the carriers are now burdened with matter of this class.

Very respectfully,

FRANK HATTON,
Acting Postmaster-General.

Hon. P. B. PLUMB,
United States Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 47, to increase the appropriation "for rent, light, and fuel" from $450,000 to $480,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "dollars," in line 48, to insert:

And the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to rent a suitable building on Capitol Hill for use as a branch of the Washington city post-office, at a rate not exceeding $30 per month.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill whether that limitation, "at a rate not exceeding $30 per month," is the amount we are now paying.

Mr. PLUMB. It is the amount now promised to be paid, but the amount has not been paid. About three years ago the Postmaster-General rented, as it became necessary for him to do, an office in East Washington for a branch office, oblivious of the fact probably that the law forbade the renting of any buildings in Washington city unless there was special authority by statute for that purpose, and the rent has never been paid. It was then represented to the committee that the continuation of the office was a necessity, and therefore it was deemed advisable to authorize this rent to be paid for the future, leaving the question of past compensation to be treated of in some of the other bills yet to come.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose the committee is satisfied that the Department can continue the occupancy of the building at the same rate?

Mr. PLUMB. They were so advised.

Mr. MORGAN. It is a very comfortable branch post-office.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 52, after the word "for," to insert "safes and other;" and in the same line, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty" and insert "forty;" so as to make the clause read:

For safes and other office furniture, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for the "Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General," in line 64, to increase the item "for transportation on railroad routes" from $11,700,000 to $12,750,000.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to ask the Senator who has charge of the bill what is the necessity for increasing that appropriation over a million dollars? I suppose the House committee had some data on which they made their appropriation. This is a very large increase in one item.

Mr. PLUMB. I will state to the Senator from Delaware that the amount to be paid to railroads for this service for the fiscal year 1884 is $11,953,244.46, being an amount greater than the amount appropriated by the House bill for next year. The only way by which a less sum could be made to answer the purpose would be to change the rate of compensation fixed by law. That the Appropriations Committee did not do. They therefore propose to appropriate what they believe will be necessary for the service according to the law as it now stands.

While on that point I ought perhaps to state the general proposition. The amount appropriated by the House is connected with a portion of the bill which is proposed to be stricken out by the Committee on Appropriations. The House bill provides for the reduction of railway transportation 5 per cent.; that is to say, that the compensation of each railroad transporting the mails shall be reduced 5 per cent. of the amount now prescribed by law. Second, the House provided for the reduction of the amount paid to land-grant railroads to 50 per cent. of the amount prescribed by law after this 5 per cent. shall be taken out. Third, the House provided for the diminution of the pay to the Union Pacific Railroad and its branches and the Central Pacific to the same amount, that is, a diminution of 50 per cent., putting the land-grant railroads and the Pacific Railroads upon the same basis of compensation, to wit, one-half that paid to other railroads.

The first reduction of 5 per cent. would in round numbers work a saving of about $600,000. There was paid to land-grant railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, $1,109,216.09. There was credited to the Pacific railroads on account of their sinking-fund indebtedness $823,748.93. The amount deducted from the Pacific railroads would cut no figure in this, because that is not to be a part of the appropriation, not being paid for in money, but being adjusted as other claims are adjusted and credited to the roads on their sinking-fund obligation; but the amount paid to the land-grant railroads diminished by half would yield a saving to the General Government of about $550,000. That, with the sum of $600,000 to be saved by a reduction of 5 per cent., would make a saving of about $1,100,000. Probably that amount would be increased a little by the difference between the service for 1883 and that for 1884, say not to exceed $100,000, making a possible saving of $1,200,000 if this system of reduction should be adopted.

The committee did not agree to it for several reasons. In the first place, they were not entirely satisfied that the amount now being paid to railroads was greater than it should be. The commission which was appointed under the appropriation bill of last year has made a very exhaustive and very thorough examination of this whole question of railway mail transportation, from which it seems to be conclusively established that the compensation the Government is paying to railways now is less than that which the railways are receiving for express matter and for other services rendered by passenger trains, being the same trains on which the mails are carried.

In the second place, that subject has been dealt with by this commission and, upon the basis of the report of the commission, by the Post-Office Committee of the House and the Post-Office Committee of the Senate. The Post-Office Committee of the House (if I may refer to what has taken place in that body) has reported favorably a bill regulating the pay of railroads for mail transportation upon a new basis reported by this commission. The Senate Post-Office Committee have also reported the same bill, and likewise sent it as an amendment to the Appropriations Committee to be put on this appropriation bill. The Appropriations Committee were not able to give to the subject that investigation which its importance warranted and did not put it upon this bill, deeming it best that before it should be put upon this bill it should be further discussed either in committee or in the Senate in such a way that all the elements of the new proposition, together with its possible and probable effect upon the gross compensation, might be thoroughly discussed in the Senate before it should become a law.

The estimate of the commission is that this new plan will save about the sum of $600,000 represented by this 5 per cent. reduction, but in an entirely different way. It is shown to the satisfaction I think of all persons who have examined the question thoroughly that the present rate is inequitable; that is to say, that it operates unequally upon different railroads, does not compensate them in proportion to what they do as they ought to be compensated, and the effect of the new system, as it is claimed, will be to redistribute the same in a manner which will be more equitable and just and at the same time effect a saving in the gross amount paid.

Pending the discussion of this question in committee and in Senate the Committee on Appropriations thought they would not deal with a subject which was being dealt with thus by committees constituted for that purpose, but would leave the whole question of the compensation of railways so far as the next fiscal year was concerned, or at all events so far as their action on this bill was concerned, to be settled by the Senate in another way.

So far as the land-grant railroads are concerned the committee did not believe that the proposition in that regard was fair. Some railroads received grants which would make it entirely equitable and proper for the Government to diminish their compensation for mail service one-half; but on the other hand there are others which have received comparatively no lands. These railroads are now carrying the mails 20 per cent. lower, by reason of the statute, than it is being carried upon the other railroads of the United States. The committee believe that if that question is to be entered upon, it should be by some committee charged with that duty by means of some bill which shall establish a principle with reference to these different railroads which shall be based in some practical, decent, and fair way on the benefits they received from the land grants of the General Government. Most of them, it may be said, are in new sections, comparatively sparsely settled; many of them are struggling already with actual or impending bankruptcy; some of them are already, as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] reminds me, in the hands of receivers. They are in a section of country where the people themselves are more largely interested in the question of railroad rates than in any other section of the country, and any interference by the Government with the receipts that these companies now have from the General Government for the transportation of the mails would undoubtedly result in the imposition of greater burdens upon the people living along the line of the roads, because what we take away from them must be made up somewhere else.

Upon the question of compensation to the Pacific railroads the action of the committee stands upon two grounds as I understand it. The first is that the question as to what the companies are entitled to receive from the General Government under their charters is now before the Supreme Court of the United States in a suit brought for that purpose. Section 6 of the original Pacific Railroad act is in these words:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the grants aforesaid are made upon condition that said company shall pay said bonds at maturity, and shall keep said railroad and telegraph line in repair and use, and shall at all times transmit dispatches over said telegraph line, and transport mails, troops, and munitions of war, supplies, and public stores upon said railroad for the Government, whenever required to do so by any Department thereof, and that the Government shall at all times have the preference in the use of the same for all the purposes aforesaid (at fair and reasonable rates of compensation, not to exceed the amounts paid by private parties for the same kind of service).

The companies claim that they are entitled to be paid under that, regarding that section as a contract which the Supreme Court seems to have decided it is between the railroad companies and the Government, and that it is not within the competency of Congress arbitrarily to fix the right of compensation, but that it must be that which is fair and reasonable, to be determined either by agreement between the Government and the companies or by a court adjudicating upon the question presented in a suit brought for that purpose. Without deciding the question as to the rights of the companies under that section, the committee thought that inasmuch as the matter was now in litigation and would be adjudicated probably before another Congress assembled in such way that legislation might be had with knowledge of the construction the court put upon the section, and further because this question of the relation of the General Government to the Pacific railways has been recently the subject of exhaustive legislation in the shape of what is known as the Thurman act which is now under process of enforcement, they ought not to enter upon that domain.

The committee do not believe that this question of the relations of the Government to the railroads should be attended to piecemeal, but if anything is lacking in reference to the obligations of the railroads to the Government, with regard to their duty to the Government, and with regard to the prices they are charging, or are entitled to charge, either to individuals or to the General Government for services rendered, they should be treated by the proper committee having these matters in charge, and with all the elements of this very important and intricate problem in view at one and the same time.

For these reasons the committee have determined to recommend striking out all about the compensation of railroads as to changes of existing law.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, in reference to the compensation paid the land-grant railroads and the Pacific railroads I have nothing to say. Perhaps it is proper to leave that matter to the decision of the courts. But I regret that the committee did not feel at liberty to make some provision in reference to the adjustment of the rates to be paid to railroad companies generally.

The commission that has reported the bill referred to by the Senator from Kansas has reported that bill, as I understand, on the basis of the charges for carrying of passengers. It is understood, I believe, that the transportation of the mails is not a matter of as much expense as the transportation of passengers, and I am satisfied that the Postmaster-General believes the compensation proposed in that bill reducing the present compensation $600,000 is too much, that it is more than ought to be paid to the railroad companies. I regret that the Committee on Appropriations have not felt at liberty to deal with that question.

It is very certain that we must have some readjustment of the compensation paid to railroad companies for the transportation of the mail. With every year the mail matter is increasing, and under the present arrangement the compensation paid to railroads necessarily increases far beyond what it is now; and that will be the case continually unless something is done to place the compensation of railroad companies for the transportation of the mails on some different basis, and I regret that the Committee on Appropriations has not felt at liberty to append to this bill an amendment which would provide some readjustment of the compensation to railroads.

The bill reported by the commission referred to by the Senator would cut down the expense $600,000 annually, and yet I am satisfied that under that bill as proposed by the commission the compensation is more than ought to be paid. We ought to save at least a million dollars from the present arrangement, I think, by some legislation readjusting the compensation of railroad companies. I am only sorry that the Committee on Appropriations did not feel at liberty to deal with it, for I fear that as an independent and separate measure there will be either not time or inclination on the part of the two Houses to deal with it at the present session, and the consequence will be that we shall pay at least a million dollars more than we ought to pay to the railroad companies for the transportation of the mail.

Mr. PLUMB. I am not prepared to say that we are not paying more than we ought to pay. That is one of those things about which men will differ. But if there is anything in the testimony which has been accessible to the committee and which was made use of by the commission the Government is paying less for its mail service than the companies are receiving for express service. I do not say now that that is the proper basis, although the mails are carried on the same trains that carry the express cars. They are carried on passenger trains. They are carried on the fastest trains. The obligation of the railroad companies by law is to do that. While we furnish a large and largely increasing business, the Senator must bear in mind that as the mails increase we diminish the rate of compensation. I call his attention now to the table which I have here, which shows the rate of compensation. From 1 pound to 200 pounds daily we pay $50 per mile per annum; for from 200 to 500 pounds we pay $75 per mile per annum; from 500 to 1,000 pounds daily, $100 per mile per annum; from 1,000 to 1,500 pounds daily, $125 per mile per annum; from 1,500 to 2,000 pounds, $150 per mile per annum; from 2,000 to 3,500 pounds daily, $175 per mile per annum; and from 3,500 to 5,000 pounds $200 per mile per annum, or a reduction of 15 per cent.; that is, 10 per cent. taken off by the act of 1876 and 5 per cent. at a later period. As the mail increases in bulk, in weight, we reduce the rate so much that we pay only four times as much for carrying 5,000 pounds daily as we pay for carrying 200 pounds daily.

While that is a very considerable reduction, and I believe it corresponds about with what ought to be the rule, at the same time it will be seen that as we increase the amount we do not necessarily increase the expense proportionately; and that is shown, too, by the fact that while we have increased the carriage of the mails on the railroads from time to time, the gross compensation has not been in proportion to the amount of the increase.

There is one other item which should be taken into consideration, and that is that the railroad companies under the law are required to deliver the mail from the train to and from all post-offices within eighty rods distance of their track. That is what we call a side service. It has been estimated that it would cost the Government, if the Government employed men to do that service under contract, not less than $1,000,000 per annum. It does not, in point of fact, cost the railroad companies near so much as that, and probably no considerable sum, because they make arrangements undoubtedly in a large number of cases for the delivery of the mail from the office to the line through the medium of their station agents, &c.; but at the same time it is a service, and it is a service coupled with a responsibility off their line of road, off their route, and is one which we could not under any reasonable exercise of power require them to perform; but they do it, and substantially without complaint.

There is one other thing in regard to this matter. We are constantly demanding and receiving from the railroad companies better service. It is a service which is vastly more interesting to the people of the United States than any other branch of the mail service. We are constantly using means and inducements to them to quieken the speed of their trains. They furnish not only the postal cars in which the mail is carried but they furnish them with lights and fuel, they furnish tables and all the paraphernalia for the performance of the duties of the route agents within the cars; and the service is not only well performed, but as I say it is constantly the aim of the Post-Office Department to increase the benefits of the service to the people by quickening the speed of trains and by making more certain the performance of schedule time and the prompt delivery of the mails.

The Senator from Delaware asks me if they do not get increased pay for increased speed, and I say to him no. Under the new plan speed is an element. Under the existing plan a railroad company gets just as much for carrying the mail ten miles an hour as it does for carrying it forty miles an hour, and that leads me to make one explanation, which ought not to be out of place here, in regard to the fast mail between New York and San Francisco recently established by the Post-Office Department, operating upon the railway companies. That fast-mail service results in twenty-four hours' saving of time between New York and San Francisco. For that the Government does not pay one single dollar more than it paid for the old schedule time. The Postmaster-General simply urgently requested that the New York Central and its connecting lines from New York to Chicago should give a more rapid schedule of time between those two points, and instead of having a lay-off of three or four hours of certain trains at Toledo, as was then the case, to close up that gap. The result was that a saving of eight hours is made between New York and Chicago. The mail which arrived at Chicago at 12.30 left Chicago at 3.30. Four lines of railroad reach from Chicago to Omaha. The Postmaster-General offered to all those railroad companies successively that he would give to them the carriage of the through mail between those two points if they would shorten the time according to the proposition which he made. All of them except one rejected it. That road is now carrying the mail on this more rapid schedule, and gets for carrying it all the through mail, the other roads getting only the local mail. The net result to the Government is just the same as it was before; the same amount of mail is being carried at the same rate; but one railroad gets all the through mail. When this new schedule was made up at Omaha it broke the connection at Omaha for the west. The Union Pacific was therefore obliged to change its schedule, and in the negotiations which ensued it made a more rapid schedule, and so did the Central Pacific, until now, as I stated, the result is that the mail is carried from New York to San Francisco in twenty-four hours less time than it was four weeks ago.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out the following words, from line 80 to line 126, inclusive:

The Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1884, for transportation of mails on railroad routes, by reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails 5 per cent. per annum from the rates for the transportation of mails on the basis of the average weight, fixed and allowed by the first section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 17, 1878: Provided, however, That all railroad companies whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress on the condition that the mails should be transported over their roads, respectively, at such price as Congress should by law direct, or on the condition that such railroad should be subject to such regulations as Congress might impose restricting the charges of Government transportation, or whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by subsidies in bonds and lands granted and issued by the United States under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River and the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and act amendatory thereof, shall receive only 50 per cent. of the compensation authorized by this act to be paid to the other railroad companies for corresponding postal service; and the above-entitled act approved July 1, 1862, and the sixth section thereof, and the act amendatory of said act approved July 2, 1864, are hereby amended to conform to the foregoing provision fixing the rate of compensation to be paid to railroad companies whose railroads were so constructed, in whole or in part, by subsidies in bonds and lands under the provisions of said acts for the transportation of the mails, and said acts, and each of them, shall be held to be altered and amended accordingly; and the foregoing provisions, and each of them, shall be subject to amendment as in the opinion of Congress shall be just and required by the public welfare; but no right now existing in favor of the United States in relation to said railroads, or either of them, or in relation to said grants, or either of them, shall be deemed impaired or waived by this act or any provision thereof.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There may be provisions in that paragraph proposed to be stricken out which I would not approve of if they were not connected with other matter; but I am satisfied that the railroad companies, under the present arrangement, are being paid and will be paid more money when there is a reweighing of the mails than is right and proper. If the first part of that clause, reducing the railway compensation 5 per cent., stood by itself, I certainly should vote against striking it out.

In reference to the land-grant railroads, I have not given the subject consideration so as to enable me to say that I should be exactly justified in voting for the clause; but as the clauses are connected together, and as I am fully satisfied that the railroad companies are getting, as a general rule, more compensation from the Government than they ought to have for the carrying of the mails, and especially that they will be very largely paid in excess of what they ought to have when there is a readjustment of the weight of the mails, which will soon take place, I cannot vote to strike out this entire paragraph. I shall therefore record my vote against the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. As this is an important amendment, I do not desire that it shall pass from the consideration of the Senate without saying a word or two in response to the Senator from Delaware.

The Senator from Delaware assumes that the railway companies are now receiving too much compensation for the transportation of the mails. It may be true that certain railways are receiving too much compensation for the transportation of the mails, but at the hearing before the Committee on Appropriations it was distinctly claimed as a reason for the establishment of the new principle, which the Senator from Delaware has expressed himself in favor of, that it would increase the compensation to certain railways, and those railway companies which now insist that the proposition suggested by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads shall be adopted do so because by reason of its adoption they will receive a greater compensation for the transportation of the mails than they are now receiving. The claim of the great railways, the through lines (so called), is that the compensation now authorized under existing statutes is not sufficient to compensate them for an efficient service, and therefore they want this new system adopted in order that they may receive increased compensation.

It occurred to the Committee on Appropriations, or at least it occurred to me, if there was to be a general saving of $600,000 by the adoption of this new principle, that inasmuch as it increased the compensation of the railways in Delaware and other Eastern States where they have a large traffic, not only with reference to the mails but also with reference to passengers, the loss must fall somewhere, and as nearly as I could judge that loss would fall upon the little railways that are scattered out in remote regions of our country, and which believe at least that they are not receiving too much compensation now.

The minimum provided in the amendment suggested by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is $35 per mile per annum. The present minimum is $42.50 for these little railways. Therefore there is a sweeping down from the railways which in my judgment can least bear a reduction. What is the result of that reduction? That reduction made upon these railroads is compensated for by an increase of compensation to the great railways of the country. The Senator from Delaware tells us that he regrets that the Committee on Appropriations did not bring in here an amendment looking to the readjustment and rearrangement of the entire railway system of our country, covering 125,000 miles of railway. I might, if I chose, retort upon him and ask him what the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads has been doing all these years, which has the care and custody of all questions of legislation with reference to the Post-Office Department. Is it expected that the Committee on Appropriations, whose duties are confined under our rules and under the general sense and judgment of the Senate to the mere appropriation of money according to existing law, will take within its grasp this great question of how much shall be paid to the railways and what the method shall be of ascertaining the payment?

I agree with the Senator from Delaware that the present compensation in some instances perhaps is too high, but I will state to him that in my judgment in other instances it is too low. The reason why I object to the 5 per cent. horizontal reduction proposed in this bill as it comes to us is that it continues the inequality and the injustice. It will strike upon the most impoverished railways of our country, and it will be a mere modicum, a mere trifle to the great railways of the country that are represented by those who live in the eastern portion of the Union more particularly.

I am not, for one, willing that the Committee on Appropriations should gather to itself this great question, and by a single blow do injustice to the great body of the railroads of the country in order to do some justice by increasing the compensation to a few railways that now have great traffic in mails as well as in express matter and passengers. Therefore it is that I was opposed to this provision for a horizontal reduction of 5 per cent.

I do not know but that I may be willing—I think I shall be willing—to put upon this very bill the readjustment proposed by the commission which examined the matter so carefully; but I agree with the Senator from Delaware that if that is put here it ought to receive many modifications. The Senator from Delaware knows very well that under that bill the Postmaster-General can add to the compensation 50 per cent., in his discretion, for special mail facilities looking to rapid mail service on the great trunk lines of the country. By that sliding scale the discretion of the Post-Office Department may increase more than a million and a half of dollars the compensation paid to the railways from year to year. And yet the Senator from Delaware says he regrets that the Committee on Appropriations did not bring in an amendment looking to a readjustment of this matter. Why, sir, the rules of the Senate permit the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to offer amendments. They have offered an amendment on this subject. The Committee on Appropriations did not report this amendment for the very reason that they were not satisfied that the method proposed was a just and fair method.

Mr. President, I will not go into the other details in reference to this amendment, but it is sufficient to say that the Committee on Appropriations believe that there is injustice not only in this 5 per cent., but injustice in the proposed reduction of 50 per cent. on the land-grant railways; and as for the great question that has been opened up here in reference to the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railways, the Committee on Appropriations, when those matters are pending in the courts and pending before other committees of this body, did not undertake to grapple with it. That is all there is in this amendment.

But I rose chiefly to give my reasons why I object to the horizontal reduction of 5 per cent. of existing rates, because of the injustice it will do to those railways which are now struggling for an existence.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I certainly did not design in the remarks I made to reflect upon the action of the Committee on Appropriations; but the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] in initiating the discussion of this question told us that the matter was considered in committee and the subject had been before the committee, and with that understanding from the Senator from Kansas I supposed that the whole subject had been investigated by the committee, and that they had come to the conclusion that this was an improper thing to do.

Mr. ALLISON. It was before the committee as a matter of course, because the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads sent it there by an amendment. They sent us an amendment which we were bound to consider, and we did consider it as best we could with the time and the lights we had before us.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Now, in reference to the increase of compensation of some of the roads, I have no doubt that the readjustment which has been suggested would result, for the Postmaster-General has so informed our Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, in the increase of compensation to certain roads, but I do not think he meant to convey the impression that the larger roads of the country should as a general thing be increased. On the contrary, the statement is that under the provisions of the bill reported by the commission there will be an aggregate reduction of over $600,000, a saving to the Government of that amount. It may be that in that particular bill there would be some injustice done to some particular railroad. I do not remember what railroads have an increase and what have a diminution of their compensation, but as a general rule I think it may be safely asserted that all the railroads under the new arrangement of weight which must take place at an early day will be compensated beyond what they ought to have, and instead of being $12,000,000 next year, there will be an appropriation of $13,000,000 or $14,000,000 unless there is some readjustment of the arrangement made with the railroad companies. It was in order that that might be done that I referred to the Committee on Appropriations, who considered the amendment which was submitted by the Post-Office Committee and saw proper to reject it, and also saw proper to reject the provision incorporated in the bill by the House which proposed a reduction.

I shall vote against striking out the provision of the House bill, because I believe that especially after the new weighing of the mails, many of which will have to be reweighed before long, the railroad companies will be fully compensated if the reduction of 5 per cent. is taken off. Therefore I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I will state in behalf of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads that they reported favorably a bill adjusting the compensation of railroads for carrying the mail. They also submitted the same measure as an amendment to the Post-Office appropriation bill. Since that time the committee has received what may be new light on the subject, and we do not feel like pushing it as an amendment on the postal appropriation bill until we have more thoroughly examined the subject. It was thought in the committee that it had better be taken up as an independent bill. It is a very important measure, and may increase the compensation in some cases and decrease it in others. It was thought at the time it was prepared that it would decrease the aggregate compensation a million dollars. Since then some doubt has been expressed, and the committee desires further time to make a more exhaustive examination of the subject before submitting it as an amendment to the appropriation bill or advocating its passage as a separate measure.

I say this to relieve the Appropriations Committee, who are not at all at fault in the matter, and who have refrained from submitting the amendment at the request of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I understood the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to say that at the present rate of compensation as continued the payment is too much in some cases.

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; the Senator should not understand me to say that. I said that it might be so. I do not know of any case where it is so. I know of several cases where the existing allowance is not enough.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I thought the Senator said that in some cases it was too much.

Mr. ALLISON. I expressly refrained from expressing that opinion, because it would not be founded on facts. I do not know of any instance where railways are receiving more than they are fairly entitled to, but I do know instances where they claim that they are not receiving enough.

Mr. VAN WYCK. If it suits the Senator to name them, he can do so.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall have no special enjoyment in doing that.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the provisions of this bill as sent to us from the House of Representatives embody two very distinct and widely different propositions. One is a general reduction of 5 per cent. from the compensation paid for carrying the mails on existing railroad routes, and the other relates entirely to the land-grant railways. I do not see how the two subjects can be properly considered together. I am not satisfied that the House made a mistake in either proposition, but it might have made a mistake in regard to one proposition without at all making a mistake in the other. I will therefore ask a division of this question, down to the ninety-second line, the word "provided," so that the question may be taken separately on the first proposition of reducing the rate of compensation 5 per cent. and then afterward taken on the other proposition in reference to the land-grant railroads.

If the land-grant railways are under this obligation by contract with the Government of the United States to carry the mails at this price, it is time that we had begun to enforce the contract against them.

Mr. ALLISON. The contract which the land-grant railroads made with the Government was that they would transport the mails at rates to be fixed by Congress.

Mr. MORGAN. Very good.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, and it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (S. 1372) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate continue the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Post-Office appropriation bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORGAN. The contract with the land-grant railroads is substantially, in every case I believe, that they should transport the mails at such rates as might be agreed upon between them and the Postmaster-General.

Mr. PLUMB. No; I think the provision was common to all of them that they should transport the mails at such price as might be fixed by Congress, but that until that price was fixed by Congress the Postmaster-General might fix it. That, I think, is it.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the same statement I was about to make, but the Senator has inverted it. At all events Congress has the right reserved in the grant to these companies to fix the compensation for the transportation of mails and other public service they may render the Government of the United States. I do not wish to fix an improper and unjust compensation to those companies. At the same time it was a part of the understanding when they got their land grants that they would return to the United States in this character of service some advantage because of the large amount of property that we conferred upon them in order to enable them to build their roads.

The people of the United States are not satisfied with the existing relations between the land-grant roads and the Government. They seem to feel very earnestly that there is a necessity for some legislation that will rectify at least the carelessness and neglect of Congress in protecting the rights of the Government against these corporations. Without declaring that I am very heartily in sympathy with any movement to restrict the railroad corporations severely in consequence of their conduct, because I appreciate the fact that they have done a great deal for this country in opening it up and in increasing the value of the public lands, still it is time that Congress had taken into consideration the question and had settled the question whether there is anything due from these railroad land-grant companies in consideration of the great grants that they have received from the Government.

I think these matters ought to be considered separately. I should like very much to hear from the Committee on Appropriations or the Committee on Post-Offices and Post Roads the reasons why the House has made a mistake, if it has made a mistake, in the reduction of the compensation of these railways as is provided in the bill which they have sent to the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. The committee dealt with this clause not on the basis of any mistake the House had made, but upon the basis of the fairness of the proposition, and more particularly upon the question of the propriety of the Appropriations Committee entering upon this question, while it was a question which had many elements in it which might properly, and more properly, be considered by other committees.

In the first place it is true, as the Senator from Alabama has said, that the people of the United States may be well considered to have derived some benefit themselves from the grants which have been made to these railroads, and the Government does derive it now, because the law imposes on these railroads the duty of carrying the mails at 20 per cent. less than is charged by other roads. Now the proposition is to reduce that to 50 per cent. of what other railroads are paid. When it came to that, the committee thought on the whole that while that was going too deep, considering all the railroads, it would be doing very gross injustice to some of them, possibly not more than justice to some others; but if the statements which have been made in regard to the cost of this transportation are true as made before the committee the price proposed by the House bill will not more than cover the cost of transportation, and in some cases probably not that. Here is a statement made by the vice-president of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy road, a land-grant road:

> On route No. 27005, for instance, a new line of 40-foot postal cars was recently ordered by the Department, for which we receive $25 per mile of road per year, or on the basis of 313 working days equals 8 cents per day for a line of cars each way one mile, or an average rate per car mile of 4 cents. This is the revenue for hauling the two-thirds additional length. Our total earnings per car mile in passenger trains are 28 cents on basis of 1882 figures. To equalize the revenue for the additional car length in postal cars we should receive 18 cents per mile, or say $125 per mile of road per year, instead of $25. The compensation received for hauling the additional two-thirds car length is only about one-half the actual cost of transportation.
> The word "cost," where used above, means simply the working expenses of the company. The actual cost is much greater, being made up of the working expenses and interest on the money borrowed and invested in the road.

Of course if that is true—and the statement is made for publication and is published by a responsible party and itemized in such a way as to be easily detected if it were not true—it would be manifestly unjust to reduce the compensation in that case certainly; and yet that is a land-grant road and one of the longest of the land-grant roads. It received a very small land grant; I think for five hundred or six hundred miles of road it only received about 300,000 acres of land. There are other cases which are worse than that. There are cases, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] said a few moments ago, where the railroads are struggling with bankruptcy. They are hard pushed to make both ends meet, and sometimes they do not. To take away from them one-half the existing compensation or any considerable proportion of it would make the difference perhaps between solvency and bankruptcy, or the hope of solvency and actual and immediate bankruptcy.

This question ought to be dealt with by itself. Congress ought to establish its relations with these different railroads on the basis of what they actually received, not upon the fact simply that they have received a land grant without reference to the amount they have received. Some of them received ample grants; others received next to nothing; the lands were taken up before the roads were built, before the lines were laid out; and so while they are land-grant roads they have to carry all the public stores of different kinds of the United States for 80 per cent. what they charge other parties, and now if they are to be required to carry the mails for 50 per cent. less, as between the two the operation of the law would be very unjust.

But it is a large question. It is a question, as I said before, that ought not to be dealt with piecemeal; it ought not to be dealt with by the Appropriations Committee but by some committee charged under the rules of this body with dealing with questions of that kind, in order that the entire history of these grants may be traced and the value of them to the different railroads in such a way as that, when legislation is had, it may result in an equitable distribution of the burdens in accordance with the benefits the companies have received.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks that the question on striking out this paragraph be divided. The Chair has some doubt whether it is capable, in the form in which it stands, of division.

Mr. HOAR. I was about to inquire of the Chair whether the mode of accomplishing that would not be simply to move to strike out the part of the clause that he wants tried first, as a way of perfecting it, before the question on striking out the whole is put?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule provides that when a question under debate is capable of division, containing more than one proposition, it may be divided on the demand of any Senator, except a motion to strike out and insert. The Chair is in some doubt whether this does in a technical sense contain two propositions, but he is inclined to think that it does in such a way that it can be divided. The Chair therefore, pursuant to the demand of the Senator from Alabama, will put the question on striking out from line 80 to the word "provided," in line 92. Is the Senate ready for the question on striking out the lines named by the Chair from 80 to the word "provided," in line 92, which will be read?

The CHIEF CLERK. The first part of the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations is to strike out the following words:

> The Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1884, for transportation of mails on railroad routes, by reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails 5 per cent. per annum from the rates for the transportation of mails, on the basis of the average weight, fixed and allowed by the first section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 17, 1878.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on striking out the residue of the paragraph.

The CHIEF CLERK. The second division of the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations is to strike out, beginning with the word "provided," in line 92, as follows:

> Provided, however, That all railroad companies whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress on the condition that the mails should be transported over their roads, respectively, at such price as Congress should by law direct, or on the condition that such railroad should be subject to such regulations as Congress might impose restricting the charges of Government transportation, or whose railroads were constructed, in whole or in part, by subsidies in bonds and lands granted and issued by the United States under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River and the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and act amendatory thereof, shall receive only 50 per cent. of the compensation authorized by this act to be paid to the other railroad companies for corresponding postal services; and the above-entitled act approved July 1, 1862, and the sixth section thereof, and the act amendatory of said act, approved July 2, 1864, are hereby amended to conform to the foregoing provision fixing the rate of compensation to be paid to railroad companies whose railroads were so constructed, in whole or in part, by subsidies in bonds and lands, under the provisions of said acts, for the transportation of the mails, and said acts, and each of them, shall be held to be altered and amended accordingly; and the foregoing provisions, and each of them, shall be subject to amendment as in the opinion of Congress shall be just and required by the public welfare; but no right now existing in favor of the United States in relation to said railroads, or either of them, or in relation to said grants, or either of them, shall be deemed impaired or waived by this act or any provision thereof.

Mr. MORGAN. This second part of the paragraph creates no necessity for new legislation, I believe, and does not fall within the rules of the Senate, which prohibit us from considering matters of new legislation upon bills of appropriation.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] has stated that already the reductions are 20 per cent. in respect to the land-grant roads below those that have received no land grants. That appears to be a pretty broad margin, and I am not prepared to say that it is not a sufficient margin. That Senator has also advanced some strong reasons in aid of the proposition that there should be some adjustment between these different land-grant railroads in proportion to what they have received, the value of the grants from the Government of the United States; but it seems to me that unless we commence we shall never get any adjustment; we shall never get any additional reduction below the 20 per cent. now taken off the land-grant railroads, which in itself, of course, is as unjust as a reduction of 50 per cent. would be; not to the same extent, but of the same nature. I think we had better go on and try this experiment at least for one fiscal year, and see whether these roads can stand it. Some of them, I am very sure, can stand it.

I have not looked carefully to see what amount of land grants the different roads have received; but I think that it would be very well inasmuch as the House demand it that we should make this experiment for at least one fiscal year. We are not likely to injure the mail service by it, and if we find that we have done a serious injustice to any companies we can compensate them in a deficiency bill or in some way. But the movement is in the right direction and seems to be demanded by the popular representatives of the country, the House of Representatives, who may be supposed to look over this question with a full consideration for the interests of the people. I shall, therefore, vote against striking out the proposition, because I think that we ought to make the experiment and see whether or not we are going to cripple the mail service or whether we are going to arrive at something like justice in balancing up the accounts between the land-grant railroads and the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment striking out the residue of the paragraph referred to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 128, to increase the appropriation "for railway post-office car service" from $1,600,000 to $1,625,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 128, to insert:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines, $185,000.

Mr. MORGAN. I would like to have that explained. I want to know what are "necessary and special facilities on trunk lines."

Mr. PLUMB. This appropriation is the same that was contained in the last appropriation bill. The bill for 1883 contained an appropriation of $600,000 for this purpose, with a design of increasing the speed by which the mails were carried between certain important points which were in the minds of the committee and were discussed with the Postmaster-General. The Postmaster-General, having $600,000, was only able to expend $185,000 of it to his satisfaction; that is to say, he could not obtain all the service that he thought ought to be had. He therefore expended $185,000. The next year, that is, for 1884, the present year, Congress appropriated $185,000; and that is being expended as follows:

Route.	Railroad company.	Distance.	Amount paid.
		Miles.
New York and Springfield	New York, New Haven and Hartford.	136	$17,647 06
The 4.35 a. m. train	New York Central and Hudson River.	142	25,000 00
Philadelphia to Baltimore	Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore.	96	20,000 00
Bay View to Quantico	Baltimore and Potomac	80	21,900 00
Quantico to Richmond	Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac.	82	17,419 26
Richmond to Petersburg	Richmond and Petersburg	23	4,197 50
Petersburg to Weldon	Petersburg	64	11,680 00
Weldon to Wilmington	Wilmington and Weldon	162	29,565 00
Wilmington to Florence	Wilmington, Columbia and Augusta.	110	20,075 00
Florence to Charleston Junction.	Northeastern Railroad, of South Carolina.	95	17,337 50
Florence to Columbia	Wilmington, Columbia and Augusta.	82	300 00
Total expended			185,121 32
Amount unexpended			414,878 68

All of which, except the first two items, amounting to $42,647.06, were expended on the line from Philadelphia to the city of Augusta, Ga., what is called the Florida line. In justification of that very urgent and earnest recommendations were made to the committee by the Postmaster-General, by the superintendent of the railway mail service, and by the persons representing the various interests of this line of roads from one end to the other, that they had adjusted their business to this fast mail, that there was not enough business on the line of the road to justify speed unless the Government paid this extra compensation, and that if it was taken off now it would require a readjustment of all the business relations of the cities south of us, Richmond, Weldon, Wilmington, Charleston, Savannah, Augusta, and so on to Jacksonville, in a way that would be very disastrous. Yielding to these representations, the committee inserted this amount, believing on the whole that it was justified, and that it was answering the main purpose of the establishment of mails, the convenience of the people and the convenience of business.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I understand from the Senator from Kansas that the object of this appropriation is to give a fast mail to as far south as Augusta, Ga.?

Mr. PLUMB. That makes connection with the fast mail to Jacksonville.

Mr. MORGAN. I wanted merely to understand and have a record of what the purpose of it was, for a wide stretch is given in the language of the act to the Postmaster-General.

Mr. CALL. I have only to say that that expedites the mail to Pensacola and all the Southern points, and also to Cuba.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the question is put I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Delaware to a case where it seems the compensation is not regarded as sufficient, to wit, the railway postal service extending from New York on the coast line to the South.

Mr. SAULSBURY. My opinion in reference to these fast mail lines is that the railroad companies are better provided for than the public. I have been over those lines. The trains do run at good speed and it is very convenient to ride upon them; there is no question about that; but the fast service has to be paid for by the public, a large majority of whom never ride upon the fast lines.

So far as the coast line is concerned, I have no doubt that it is as worthy to receive this kind of bounty as any railroad in the country, and that it accommodates as many people, but I doubt very much the propriety of it. Almost all the railroads throughout the country go with sufficient speed to carry the mails. It may be true that a man in Charleston would receive his mail three or four hours, perhaps six hours, sooner than he would do if there was no fast mail; but we can not afford to subsidize every line in the country. It is only certain portions of the country that can be accommodated by these fast lines. I have seen some account of the fast line to Chicago, and I have read in the Chicago papers that the people of that city are not benefited; that the arrivals there of the train are after business hours, and the people do not receive their mails in time for that particular day.

I doubt very much whether an expenditure of this kind is a proper one. I certainly have a very kindly feeling toward this Southern line, because I have traveled over it and I have seen the destitute country through which it passes. The local trade there can not sustain a fast mail, I presume, without some aid, and it is an accommodation to the people in that section of the country to a certain extent, and especially to those who ride upon the railroad. I am satisfied that I should like to ride upon that fast line much better than I would upon a slow train, but the question is whether the Government of the United States should pay for the convenience and accommodation of those of us who see proper occasionally to ride over the line.

I did not intend to say anything in reference to this matter, and would not have done so except that my attention was called to it by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. MORGAN. Ordinarily I would not vote for a bill that made discriminations between different sections of the country unless there was some real public necessity for it, but I can see that those parts of our country which are distant from the capital and distant from the great commercial marts ought to have the advantage of fast mails in order that their business communications and other information may be rapidly conveyed to them. The mere fact of their being distant, and of their not having sufficient conveniences through that country for the distribution of mails and telegraphic information rapidly, would seem to indicate that there should be some advantage given to them, or at least that they should be supplied more promptly, more rapidly, with information than the persons who live near the great centers, and who therefore have not the same occasion for this assistance that the people at remoter places have.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 132, to increase the appropriation "for inland transportation by steamboat routes" from $600,000 to $625,000.

Mr. MORGAN. I notice that in a former part of the bill the sum of $12,750,000 is appropriated for the transportation of mails on railways. That is right; but the disproportion between that sum and $625,000 for the transportation of mails on rivers is certainly very great, and I think is very unjust. We are spending an average of something like $10,000,000 a year in the improvement of our rivers and harbors, about one-half of which goes to the improvement of the navigation of the rivers. That expenditure is said to be justified because it aids the commerce of the country, the commercial convenience of the country in the transportation of crops, &c., and if justified at all it must be upon that ground. But the steamboats running upon the different improved navigable waters are also very valuable vehicles for the conveyance of the mails to the people, and this provision is not by any means commensurate with the importance of the subject. I will move to strike out "$625,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$1,000,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks such an amendment under the rules is not in order unless it is reported from a standing or select committee or unless it is in pursuance of estimates.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to make a statement which I think will be satisfactory to the Senator from Alabama about this matter. I have here a letter showing the entire amount estimated for, and the committee would cheerfully have inserted any amount that was estimated for, being fully alive to the importance of this service; but I think the extract from the letter of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General will demonstrate that the amount proposed by the committee is enough. He says:

> The amount for inland transportation by steamboat routes, namely, $600,000, should be increased to $625,000, as recommended by my predecessor on pages 4 and 5 of his report for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883. The amount paid for steamboat service performed during the six months ended December 31, 1883, was $302,592.95.
> The number of contractors is one hundred and eleven.
> The service has since been reduced so that the annual rate of expenditure March 22, 1884, was $587,990. Add to this the sum of $9,276, that will be necessary on the opening of navigation on the northern lakes, and it will make the annual rate of expenditure on June 30, 1884, $597,266. It is therefore certain that the expenditure for the current fiscal year will nearly equal if it does not exhaust the appropriation.
> Contracts on a number of routes will expire on June 30, and will have to be relet. A number of contracts were awarded March 5, ultimo, for service from July 1, 1884, at an average increased cost of 5.54 per cent. over present rates ($88,747), which will be $4,917; the estimated additional cost of reletting other routes and of providing new service that will be necessary July 1, 1884, is $20,848; rate of expenditure June 30, $597,266; estimated annual rate of expenditure July 1, 1884, $623,031.

So that it will be seen we have given not only the full amount of the estimate, but that the estimate itself was based upon a careful overhauling of the entire service as now existing and its probable future needs.

So far as I am concerned I have no objection to making the sum larger, because I am satisfied that the Department will not expend it if it should not be necessary. It is, as the Senator from Alabama says, a very important service, and because it is an important service and because it is a service which cannot be otherwise supplied, and which if left off will leave the people along the lines of these various steamboats entirely without mail service, the committee put it up beyond the estimate.

Mr. MORGAN. I find that under the rules which have been quoted by the Chair I shall not be able to increase this appropriation, and the fault, if there is any, in connection with this matter lies with the Post-Office Department in not making a proper estimate for this service.

I am aware of the fact that there is a prejudice in the Post-Office Department against river mail service, and very much to the detriment of the people of the Southern States especially. I suppose that those officers do not understand the difference between the rivers which empty through the Atlantic coast and those that empty into the Gulf. The lower waters of the Alabama and the Mississippi and various other rivers that run into the Gulf of Mexico are very much embarrassed by immense swamps extending on either side of the river. The rivers are very crooked, and persons going to reside in those swamps to cultivate the land, for convenience as well as for health, find it necessary that they should reside mainly upon the banks of the rivers. In many cases the lands recede from the shores of the rivers back toward the hills, and those large estuaries, which were formerly arms of the sea, have been filled up by deposit from centuries of accretion and are very difficult of access from the hill country.

I have called this matter to the attention of the Post-Office Department for the last four years. I have been trying to get a mail established on the Alabama River. Steamboats run from Mobile to Montgomery on the Alabama River with almost exactly the same certainty that the railway trains run, and have been doing so for fifty years past. The Alabama River is a very tortuous stream, and from its confluence with the Tombigbee River to the seacoast the swamps broaden out and are almost inaccessible at certain stages of high water by mail-carriers or by any means except by steamboats. The lands are very fertile; the population is comparatively dense. It is a very enlightened population, using a great deal of reading matter and having a great deal of correspondence.

The steamboats that go into Mobile and leave that port for the upper river on every trip carry an average of 1,500 letters for distribution at the different landings, and of course they return with about an equal amount from the upper waters of the river. The steamboat captains are prohibited by law from receiving this mail matter on their boats, as I think absolutely, because the rivers are declared post-routes by the general statutes of the United States. Nevertheless they do receive letters in stamped envelopes. It makes no difference what may be the emergency or the difficulty of getting stamped envelopes on the Alabama River, no matter how many postage-stamps a person may have, he can not send a letter unless he happens to be able to get hold of the particular kind of stamp that the Government prescribes in its statutes. You must have a stamped envelope; otherwise you can not put a letter upon one of those steamboats either to go out of Mobile to the home of the planter or to go from his home to the city. After the 1,500 letters are carried to Mobile the shipmasters have to pay the expense of having them carried to the post-office for distribution. Of course they get no revenue or pay whatsoever for this very important service.

The river is crossed at various places by post-routes. The mails are carried on horseback in some cases and in others in buggies, wagons, &c., but the river is so very crooked and the swamps are so broad that it is very difficult to get to the post-offices. There might be a post-office right opposite a man's residence where there is no ferry across the river. It may cost him fifteen miles of travel and his ferriage besides to get across the river to that post-office. A steamboat coming along and landing at his wharf or landing could deliver him his mail matter, whether letters, papers, periodicals, or whatever it might be, very conveniently to the Government. But under the administration of the law as it is carried on in the Post-Office Department that matter is not only not attended to but willfully and obstinately refused.

The other day I sent to the Post-Office Department a petition signed by more than five hundred of the citizens living along the banks of the Alabama River, who begged the Postmaster-General that he would establish a mail-route on the Alabama River. There has been a mail-route there since I was a boy until the last six or seven years, but some subordinate man in the Post-Office Department has got at cross-points with some steamboat river captains, and the consequence is that the people of that whole section of country are deprived of these mail facilities and no mail is allowed to run on the Alabama River.

Now, look at the other points in the case. The Alabama and the Tombigbee flow together about one hundred and twenty miles above Mobile by the line of the water courses. They send out regularly mails from Mobile up the Tombigbee as far up as Columbus, in Mississippi. A regular line of mail communication is kept up on the Tombigbee River, and yet the larger river, much the more important one, from Mobile to Montgomery, Ala., the capital of the State, is denied a mail entirely. Five hundred people petition the Postmaster-General begging him that he will establish a mail there; we vote all the money that the Department requires, and yet we can not get a mail upon that river.

I have felt it to be my duty to make this statement before the Senate of the United States in the hope that the Postmaster-General or the Second Assistant Postmaster-General may divert his attention sufficiently long from the manipulation of political conventions, in my State at least, to read over the petition of those five hundred people which I am satisfied has never been unrolled in that office. All the letters that you can write, all the remonstrances that you can utter, have no effect whatever upon those officers. I declare in the presence of the Senate of the United States that I believe the Post-Office Department of this Government is more abused by its being used simply as political machinery than any Department of the Government ever was since the foundation of the United States Constitution.

I suppose it is beyond my power by an amendment of this bill in any way to get the redress which we seek and which we ought to have at the hands of the Postmaster-General. I suppose that he is out of the reach of the power of legislation, unless the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads will report a bill which we can enact into a law by which he would be compelled to establish mail-routes and have the mails conveyed upon steamboats that run on the principal rivers in the Southern States. I thought perhaps that by an amendment of this bill I might in some way or other require him to make an equitable distribution of this money among the different great water courses in this country, but I have taxed what little of ingenuity I possess to see if I could get in reach of some proposition that would control him. He seems to be entirely beyond the control of Congress. There was never such discretionary power conferred upon any Department of this Government since its foundation as is conferred, and I suppose necessarily, upon the Post-Office Department, but it seems to me that the very breadth of that discretion, the necessity Congress is under to grant this great discretionary power to the Post-Office Department, ought to stimulate them to honesty, to impartiality, to fidelity, and to equity in the distribution of the great amount of money that we place under their control. As it is it is denied arbitrarily to sections that deserve it, that need it, that make their contributions to the Post-Office Department regularly, and we are here without any remedy whatsoever.

Something was said this morning about the Post-Office Committee in connection with this bill. I have been trying to recall to my recollection whether since I have been here the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads had offered any important amendment to the postal laws, and I have failed to recall it. The old system under which we were trundling along seven or eight years ago remains precisely as it was then.

Now, would it not be quite convenient that you should put a free delivery and a mail carrier upon the steamboat, who might deliver letters along the Alabama River precisely as they are delivered here in the city of Washington, at the place of business or the place of residence, as it might be, of the party to whom they were addressed? Those people are paying postage upon 1,500 letters every steamboat that goes in and out of Mobile, and yet they have no mail, and if they chance to send a letter in an ordinary envelope with an ordinary postage-stamp upon it they are liable to prosecution in the Federal courts, and to a fine of $50 for presuming thus to put a letter upon a steamboat to be carried to Mobile, because that is a postal route.

I hope that something may be done. I hope that the Post-Office Committee during the present session of the Senate will take this subject into hand, and will require of the Postmaster-General that he shall make some use of postal convenience and postal service on those rivers, the navigation of which we are spending $10,000,000 a year to improve.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Lyman, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, is the last one on earth to be accused of devoting his time to politics. But I did not get up to defend the Post-Office Department. I wanted to thank the Senator from Alabama for his liberality. He desires to increase the inland steamboat service, where now the provision is $625,000. I hope the Senator will remember, when there is under consideration another bill in a few days from this time, that the sum appropriated here for the steamboat inland service is over $300,000 more than the Post-Office Department under law pays for the transportation of all the United States mails over the whole world in steamships and sailing vessels. Last year they paid only $239,000 for all that service.

This service is done by contract. This service amounts on the average to 57 cents a mile, and the service across the ocean last year did not amount to 7 cents a mile. The service from Philadelphia to Queenstown is only 3 cents a mile. The service on the Pacific mail steamers was only 7 cents a mile. This is done by contract with these inland steamers, and no contract is made at all for any foreign service, but under the law you seize a steamship and hold her to her wharf until the post-office bag is ready for delivery, and then let her sail without passengers and with her mail and pay at the rate of about 1 cent a letter.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Maine is repeating in very much better style than I could have done or than I did originally in propounding the same argument two years before he came to the Senate, when upon a Post-Office appropriation bill I moved an amendment that we should extend the postal service of the United States on the high seas, and that we should enter into a contract with American steamers for the transportation of mails to foreign countries upon such routes as the Postmaster-General or Congress might designate. So I am heartily in accord with the Senator upon that subject, and when he comes to find me voting upon questions of that kind he will find that I am quite as liberal as he is.

I do not know Mr. Lyman. The Senator calls his name. I do not know the gentleman. I can not agree with him, however, that the cause of politics, party politics and petty politics, is not found constantly at work in the Post-Office Department to control not merely the appointment of the officers who are to discharge the duties of the postal service, but also as I believe to discriminate against communities which are not in accord with the present administration.

Mr. PLUMB. My friend from Alabama knows that I always listen to him with a great deal of pleasure and a great deal of respect. I have known him as a liberal man in regard to appropriations and in regard to every other subject of legislation so long as I have known him on this floor. I think he has said about the Post-Office Department not only what is not justified, but what he will not justify himself in having said when he comes to know the Department better or when he comes to reflect further upon the statement which he has made.

I realize the force of what he has said about the importance of this inland steamboat service. Not only do I not challenge his statement of fact, but I agree with him. I have no doubt he has stated the entire truth in regard to the lack of service in the section of country which he so well represents and which he is entitled to speak for. The committee took an enlarged view of that, as we believe, in giving to the Post-Office Department all they asked for, increasing the amount above that named in the bill as it came from the House. If I were authorized now to go to the point named by the Senator from Alabama I would do it. I would not, however, do that if I had the same opinion of the Post-Office Department which he himself expresses, but I would vote to give them $1,000,000 on his motion if I could do so, believing that the money would be properly spent, and with the sole end and aim of the advancement of the public interests with reference to carrying the mails, and not with reference to the advancement of the political fortunes of any party or any individual.

I believe it can be said, truthfully in regard to the Post-Office Department that so far as it is possible to eliminate politics from it, that is to say, with reference to anything which affects the security, the celerity, the value of the postal service to the people of the United States, that Department has carried on the service; and while I regret that the Senator from Alabama has now so poor an opinion of it, I think he will sometime have a better one and on better knowledge than he is possessed of to-day.

I am now authorized by the Committee on Appropriations, in response to what the Senator from Alabama has said, to move to insert, after the word "hundred," in line 132, the words "and fifty," so as to make the amount $650,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is that in pursuance of the direction of the committee?

Mr. PLUMB. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive it then. The Senator from Kansas, from the Committee on Appropriations, moves to amend the amendment by striking out, in line 132, the words "and twenty-five" and inserting the words "and fifty," so as to read, if amended:

For inland transportation by steamboat routes, $650,000.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know if the motion will be exactly in order, but after the statement made by the Senator from Alabama I move to add to the clause—

Twenty thousand dollars of which shall be applied to carrying the mails on the Alabama River.

After the statement made here by a Senator and a petition of five hundred citizens residing there who can not get mail accommodations, I think that Congress should interfere and make the appropriation specifically for that point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment to insert the words "and fifty," after the word "hundred," in line 132, after which the Chair will consider the amendment indicated by the Senator from Delaware. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Upon reflection I shall not offer my amendment. The suggestion is made that under the increased appropriation, perhaps that service will be put on without it.

Mr. FRYE. Of course that will be done, for the amendment was made at the suggestion of the speech of the Senator from Alabama.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 133, before the word "million," to strike out "four" and insert "five;" so as to read:

For inland transportation by star-routes, $5,600,000.

And to strike out after "dollars," in line 134, the following words:

Together with the further sum of $1,000,000, which is hereby reappropriated, out of any unexpended balance of the appropriation for the postal service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883.

Mr. PLUMB. Senators will observe by reading the entire paragraph that the appropriation is exactly the same, except that the House transferred a fund which they assumed to exist. I have a letter from the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department stating that there is no such fund, and consequently the paragraph as it came from the House will be totally ineffective. I ask that the letter may go into the RECORD without being read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be printed in the RECORD if there be no objection.

The letter is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF THE TREASURY
FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., April 11, 1884.

SIR: In your letter of the 19th ultimo you invite my attention to a clause in House bill 5459, making appropriations for the postal service for the year ending June 30, 1885, which reads as follows: "For inland transportation by star-routes, $4,600,000, together with the further sum of $1,000,000, which is hereby appropriated out of any unexpended balance of the appropriation for the postal service for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883." And you ask, "If this bill becomes a law will the appropriation thereby made be sufficient to maintain star service costing $5,600,000 per annum and to pay therefor without applying to Congress to make good by a deficiency appropriation of $1,000,000, or any part thereof." In reply I have to say that I presume the clause was framed under the impression that the amounts appropriated for the postal service remain available for two years after the close of the fiscal year for which they are made. Such is the practice in dealing with the general Treasury fund as the surplus in the Treasury permits of it. But the postal revenues are rarely in excess of the expenditures.

There was a surplus for the fiscal years 1882 and 1883, while this year there is a deficiency in excess of such surplus. This deficiency can only be supplied in two ways, by using the surplus of previous years or by drawing upon the general Treasury funds under section 2 of the act of March 3, 1883 (Statutes, volume 22, page 455). The better practice would seem to be to first exhaust the surplus postal revenues, and this course seems to be contemplated in the opening paragraph of the acts making appropriations for the postal service, which reads: "That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated for the service of the Post-Office Department * * * out of any money in the Treasury arising from the revenues of said Department in conformity to the act of July 2, 1836." It will be observed that the phrase "not otherwise appropriated," found in all acts making appropriations from the general Treasury fund, does not appear in the above paragraph.

After setting apart a sufficient sum to meet existing liabilities for prior years the remaining surplus was drawn upon and exhausted to meet expenditures for the first quarter of the current year, and the revenues of this year have not been sufficient to restore that surplus, and will not be, as drafts must be made on the general Treasury to pay for the service of the current quarter.

I presume that it will only be necessary to present this showing to the Senate committee to secure such an amendment of the clause in question as will supply the whole amount of $5,600,000 from the revenues of 1885.

Respectfully,

J. H. ELA, Auditor.

Hon. H. D. LYMAN,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was in line 138, after the item for inland transportation by star-routes, to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the Postmaster-General may contract under a miscellaneous advertisement for the performance of necessary postal service in Alaska for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, without inviting proposals therefor by publication in a newspaper as required by the act of May 17, 1878, no newspaper being published in that Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 146, to increase the appropriation "for railway post-office clerks" from $4,000,000 to $4,300,000.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask to have a communication from the superintendent of the railway mail service in regard to that item—which shows the precise places where all the clerks are needed which are provided for by this additional appropriation—inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be inserted in the RECORD if there be no objection.

The letter is as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT OF RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., April 1, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to hand you herewith small book, which will give you in detail the additional force that is estimated to be necessary for the present fiscal year that the state of the appropriation would not permit being provided. I have carefully reviewed the same, and find that there are at the present time three hundred and sixty-four additional clerks required, of which two hundred and seven should be appointed to old lines and one hundred and fifty-seven to new service. This estimate does not refer to the appropriation for the next fiscal year, as it is not the practice of this office to call upon division superintendents for the estimate until after the appropriation is made. Then it is considered in detail and distributed to the different sections according to our best judgment. The average annual salary paid postal clerks is $994.15. It is our practice in estimating additional men to estimate upon the average salary paid clerks. There are now a large number of clerks who are entitled to promotion under the law but the appropriation will not permit it, and I have recently issued a circular letter to division superintendents that no more promotions can be made during the present fiscal year.

Very respectfully,

W. B. THOMPSON, General Superintendent.

Hon. P. B. PLUMB,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Table showing the additional force necessary.

Railway post-office line.	Miles.	Old or new.	Present force.	Additional force.	Remarks.
FIRST DIVISION.
North Conway and Portsmouth		Old		1	To be consolidated with Bangor and Boston short run, which has 3 clerks, who run between Portsmouth and Boston.
Boston and Fitchburg		Old		1	To give double daily service between Fitchburg and South Framingham.
Boston and Newport		New		1
Boston and Plymouth		New		3	Two routes; one to run between Duxbury and Cohasset, the other via South Abington.
Boston and Providence		Old		1	Helper.
Boston, Springfield and New York		Old		4	For catcher service between Boston and New York.
Boston and Waterbury		Old		2	To be extended to Brewster Station.
Plymouth and North Woodstock		New		1
Lancaster and Wells River		New		1
Manchester and South Ware		New		1
New Haven and New York		Old		1	To give additional daily service.
Palmer and New London		Old		1	To give double daily service.
Rutland and Fitchburg		New		1
White River Junction and Concord		New		1
White River Junction and Springfield		Old		2	To give 2 men to a set.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 148, to increase the appropriation "for mail-messengers" from $900,000 to $975,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 152, to increase the appropriation "for mail-bags and mail-bag catchers" from $230,000 to $250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 186, to insert:

To pay the expenses of delegates to the Universal Postal Union congress, to be held at Lisbon, Portugal, on the 1st of October, 1884, $4,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. PLUMB. I shall not, unless some one calls for it, say anything in explanation of this item, but I ask that the letter of the Postmaster-General in regard to it be placed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be printed in the RECORD, if there be no objection.

The letter is as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 28, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that in pursuance of the provisions of article 19 of the Paris convention of the Universal Postal Union the next quinquennial postal congress of plenipotentiaries of the countries and colonies embraced in the Postal Union will assemble at Lisbon, Portugal, on the 1st of October next, for the purpose of perfecting the system of the union by introducing into it such improvements as experience of its practical workings have shown to be necessary to complete the system.

As many important modifications of the Paris convention and the regulations thereunder are proposed for consideration and decision by that congress, some of which are of special interest to this Department, it is necessary that the United States should be represented by experienced postal officers familiar with the operations of the international mail service, and for the purpose of defraying the expenses incident to their attendance at the congress I respectfully ask an appropriation at the present session of the sum of $4,500, to be expended under the direction of the Postmaster-General.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. Q. GRESHAM, Postmaster-General.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman of Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section 2 the following:

SEC. 2. That if the revenues of the Post-Office Department shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations made by this act, a sum equal to such deficiency of the revenues of said Department is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply the said deficiencies in the revenue of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1885.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the question will be taken in gross on concurring in the amendments. The Chair hears no objection.

The amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. INGALLS. The regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bankruptcy bill, being the special order.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the regular order be announced.

The SECRETARY. "A bill (S. 1372) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States."

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. PLATT. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was not agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It is necessary to have a short executive session. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 1 hour and 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 193) to provide for printing certain documents relating to customs revenues and domestic exports for the use of Congress.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 2031) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near Sibley, in the State of Missouri; and

A bill (H. R. 6370) to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal-revenue laws.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourns to meet on Monday next.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE HERNDON.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the resolutions from the House of Representatives commemorative of the death of Mr. HERNDON be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. INGALLS in the chair). The Secretary will read the resolutions at length.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 12, 1884.

Resolved, That this House has heard with deep regret of the death of Hon. THOMAS H. HERNDON, late a Representative-elect to this House from the State of Alabama.

Resolved, That as a testimony of respect to his memory the officers and members of this House will wear the usual badge of mourning for the space of thirty days.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the Clerk of this House to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to communicate a copy of these proceedings to the Senate; and that, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, this House do now adjourn.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I offer resolutions which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate shares with the House of Representatives in its expressions of sorrow at the death of Hon. THOMAS H. HERNDON, lately a Representative in that body from the State of Alabama.

Resolved, That, as a mark of sympathy toward the family of the deceased, the Secretary of the Senate will transmit to them a copy of these proceedings.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, after our friends have passed away it is a grateful privilege to commemorate their virtues, and to draw from the history of their lives the lessons which teach us how to emulate them in their good deeds and aspirations. It is not often that a man has departed beneath the meridian sun of life whose taking off has left a deeper sorrow or has deprived society of a more beloved friend and the country of a wiser or more useful citizen than THOMAS H. HERNDON. To say that he was endeared to all who knew him is only to express their confidence in the purity of his life and in his fidelity to all good principles, and to repeat toward the departed the earnest friendship which he inspired by his noble and generous bearing, and which he extended to every good man with cordial sincerity. He was a native of Alabama, born at Erie, on the 1st July, 1828, when the State had been but nine years in political existence. He was educated chiefly by Professor Tutwiler, a great teacher and a man of the highest worth, and afterward took his degree in the University of Alabama. He was a representative in the Legislature for several terms, was a delegate to the secession convention in 1861, and served with distinction in the civil war in command of the Thirty-sixth Alabama Regiment. Afterward he was elected thrice in succession as a member of the House of Representatives of the United States, and died while in the service of his State as a member of Congress.

This is a good record in its outline, and speaks eloquently of the public confidence he enjoyed during all his manhood, and it was filled up in all the stages of his public service with conscientious diligence, and with honest, faithful, wise, and able counsels, that greatly benefited the country and added much to the influence and reputation of Alabama. He was a dutiful and loving son of Alabama—a proud and noble mother. His ashes are at rest in her bosom, and his memory is in her sacred keeping. His last sickness was very protracted and wearing, but he quietly and patiently confronted death, for months together, without the least agitation of spirit, and with a degree of confidence and cheerful resignation that made his sick-chamber a place of attraction more than of grief to his anxious friends. He was not a stoical philosopher, but of broad and enlightened Christian faith. Those who gathered around him in his long suffering were deeply moved as they witnessed how he was attended during every moment with a tenderness and gentle devotion that it would be rudeness to describe here, which makes the better side of life radiant with beauty and lovely with its excellence.

His mental composure and strength of will never yielded to the depressing influences which left him physically prostrate after long months of severe illness; and his mind was so clear and vigorous that he was able to give useful advice to his colleagues respecting public affairs in which he took great interest while in the daily expectation of death. When the Forty-seventh Congress adjourned he was ready to go home and die, but not until then. He rallied all his remaining powers to the task of returning to his native land, that he might yield up his spirit in Alabama, his beloved home. Consecrated in every affection of his nature, Alabama received him with the grief of a stricken mother. I am proud to accept this man and his life and character as the true type of a native Alabamian.

Colonel HERNDON inherited the qualities which compelled him to the highest and noblest aspirations; and his lineage and the surroundings of his youth directed his thoughts and his ambition toward the service of his country in the maintenance of the constitutional rights of the people. This was a labor of love with him in which he never faltered or grew weary.

A chivalrous spirit inherited from honorable ancestors, and devoted to the holy cause of justice, is something that lifts up the people to a proper conception of their dignity and power in a government like ours. In this sense Colonel HERNDON was a chevalier without reproach. He served his State as one who loved its people and was jealous of its honor. He had many peers, but none were more truly noble. In the many severe battles of the civil war from which he narrowly escaped with his life, but with wounds of which he at last died, he left numbers of his peers and comrades dead on the field. At Chickamauga he received his summons to an early death. His comrades were a glorious host of the true men of the South, whose fame is still more illustrious now that he has again joined them. As the years recede they are not forgotten. Their memory is still precious to the hearts of millions of people, and their heroism becomes more impressive in its grateful and romantic interest to the new generations as they arise. Tears still well up in the dimmed eyes of their surviving comrades, whose bosoms, though chilled with age and penury, still grow warm with love as their tongues whisper the praises of their heroic dead. Rivers and mountains and plains, baptized with their blood, have become the enduring landmarks of their fame, and will forever commemorate their deeds of honor.

It is fitting that I should describe briefly the characteristics of the people who found a true and worthy representative in THOMAS H. HERNDON. Their qualities gave tone and strength to his manhood and he was thus in every sense their representative. The attractions of a fresh and beautiful country acquired from the Indian tribes drew to Alabama in the early days of its history a large number of people from all the Atlantic States from Massachusetts to Georgia. They were mainly of the classes who had means to purchase the best lands in considerable bodies and had the fortitude to endure the hardships of a pioneer life. In such communities are usually found great enterprise and intelligence and much of native ability and independence of character, and these are safe foundations upon which to build all social and political institutions.

With the assistance of slave labor the work of reducing the wilderness to cultivation was rapidly accomplished, and the land was speedily covered with productive farms and many of the public conveniences which are necessary to a prosperous people.

The people thus drawn together were largely composed of the better classes from the older States, having left behind them the prejudices and peculiarities they may have adopted in their earlier lives. The country rapidly acquired wealth, and with it the people had leisure for mental improvement, for indulgence in agreeable pursuits and diversions, and for the cultivation of their tastes. Their homes were not pretentious in architecture or in ornamentation. They preferred the beautiful forest trees and flowers in their ample grounds to costly decorations or splendid mansions. It was not unusual to find in the newly opened farms a cosy log-house, surrounded with rough fences, but convenient, roomy, and comfortable, furnished with elegance and taste, and provided with every appliance to make home pleasant and attractive. The wives and daughters of these families took great pride in dispensing a generous hospitality with elegance and grace. They were saved from much of the drudgery of ordinary domestic work, and had leisure to devote to social duties and to their mental improvement. They were happy in their homes and reflected their happiness on others. The wealth of these new communities was only great enough to give them leisure for useful reflections and to stimulate them to rivalry in the education of their children and in self-improvement, without affording them the means or the inducement to idleness or the indulgence of a love of ease. They were active and efficient workers, in full sympathy with the vigorous growth and prosperity of the country, and the comfort of their families was an object that engaged their most earnest care.

Above all else they valued the sacred character and the holy mission of woman, and in this respect the reward of their honorable sentiments was realized in the highest degree. Their sons were found capable of any sacrifices which duty and honor required, and were proud of their lineage. They rejoiced in their families and homes, where their sisters and mothers were honored. A sense of duty and a sentiment of honor deeply rooted in the affections of the home circle are the surest guarantees to society and to the State of the integrity and fidelity of any man. It is in this way that their chaste regard for social duty, their love of home and family, their devout faith in Christianity, their zeal for the excellent results which only the truth and grace and moral strength of woman can create in society, have so deeply impressed the benignant influence of woman upon the character of the Southern people that these blessings will remain with them to the latest generations.

It was among this class of people that the mother of THOMAS H. HERNDON was found. A descendant of the Toulmins of England, she inherited the qualities which caused her ancestors to seek an asylum in America from religious persecution in England, preferring the hardships of voluntary exile in the wilderness to ease and comfort at the expense of liberty of conscience.

In the first dawn of his manhood the beautiful guiding light of his whole life shone upon him. He married a young girl who was descended from Abram Alexander, the president of the Mecklenburg convention which declared the independence of North Carolina in May, 1775. The faith of her great ancestor in the justice of the cause of American independence was repeated in the faith of this gentle wife in the cause in which her husband made a sacrifice of his fortune and finally of his life. The president of the Mecklenburg convention transmitted to his descendants those heroic qualities which led him to espouse and to abide by a cause which was sacred to him, although it was denounced as treason from the throne of Great Britain. His great-granddaughter was not less true or heroic than he was in her devotion to a cause that she espoused, and yet she was not more devoted to her principles than were millions of the women of the South, among whom there was no dissenting opinion and no diversity of sentiment during the terrors of the civil war. They were the soul of the confederacy.

On his father's side Colonel HERNDON was descended from a family distinguished for abilities and integrity of character. Thus it is apparent that in knowing the people that he represented in his lineage and among whom his character was formed we know him. Their blood coursed in his veins, giving strength to his principles, courage to his soul, breadth to his intellect, beauty and grace to his manly form, gentleness to his spirit, elevation to his sentiments, and steadfastness to his devotion to duty. His earnest and ever ready response to the noble impulses which this rich tide imparted to his thoughts and feelings made him a typical son of the South.

Colonel HERNDON'S high sense of honor kept him always true in his conduct to his convictions of duty. When he was in the secession convention of Alabama and in the confederate army no man was more faithful than he was to the cause in which he was enlisted. When he again resumed his allegiance to the United States his fidelity to that Government was true and heartfelt. He was incapable of deception, and would never have accepted an attitude toward the United States that would have caused him the least embarrassment in the faithful service of that Government. He was always honest, and therefore he was always true.

His acquaintance was very extensive, but it was not wider than that atmosphere of warm and appreciative affection which pervaded all classes of people to whom he was known.

A soldier, a scholar, a jurist, a statesman; a Christian, genuine, true, faithful, and devout, he is entitled to the honors which the American Senate are now awarding to his memory. But in the more endearing character of friend and comrade, the silent tribute of a tear moistens the eye of the grateful poor and steals down the bronzed cheek of the warrior to utter higher praises than we can embody in resolutions. "Let him rest in peace, for he has nobly earned his high reward."

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, the interesting sketch which has been presented by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] of the life and public services of the late THOMAS H. HERNDON informs us that he enjoyed unusual opportunities for education and for moral and social discipline and that he filled many positions of public honor and responsibility.

Born in Hale County, Alabama, July 1, 1828, educated at the University of the State, he had hardly completed the study of the law in the University at Cambridge, Mass., and entered his profession before he embarked in public life. He was a representative in the General Assembly and a trustee of the University of Alabama, a member of the constitutional convention, a major, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel in the confederate army, and the candidate of the Democratic party for the governorship of the State in 1872; again a member of a constitutional convention and of the General Assembly of the State, he was finally elected to be a Representative from the first Congressional district in the Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, and Forty-eighth Congresses, but he did not live to take his seat in the Forty-eighth Congress.

His honors survived him. He was called away from a loving fireside and associations most dearly prized, from a confiding constituency, from the enjoyment of every favor of fortune, and from the performance of great public trusts while in the meridian of life and in the full maturity of his powers, while—

> Hope elevates, and joy
> Brightens his crest.

Come when it may, to the young or old, the inevitable and universal summons must always impress us with the profound mystery of life and death, the uncertainty of humanity; but whenever I behold a strong man fall midway his journey, arrested at the very moment when earthly rewards and honors were being reaped and when his usefulness was greatest to his fellow-men, I can only repeat again and again the mournful exclamation of Burke over his dead son, "What shadows we are; what shadows we pursue!"

I was his comrade and friend in the Southern army and his associate in the House of Representatives, and I trust therefore I may be pardoned if I take this opportunity to pay a passing tribute to his memory and to give utterance to my deep sorrow at his untimely death.

It can not be said that Mr. HERNDON had achieved a national reputation as a statesman or that he has left a name illustrious in the field of letters, philosophy, science, or war; yet in many respects he was a remarkable man and in all an admirable one.

Throughout his whole life he appeared rather to avoid than to attract public attention, and though possessing sound convictions, earnestness of purpose, and a noble ambition, he shunned all mere parade and the pursuit of distinction as an object. His watchword was duty, and the practice of self-denial and manly modesty was a part of his nature. The superficial observer would have said that he was too undemonstrative and reserved, too little of a self-seeker and flatterer, too little schooled in the arts of the vulgar politician, too independent and frank, ever to obtain or to hold the favor of the public; that he was not sufficiently sensational and the "hail fellow well met" to go before the people. But here we have the spectacle of a man who from the bottom of his heart despised all wire-pulling, all machine politics, all claptrap, who was self-contained and self-respecting, yet won and held the confidence and affection of the people of the State of Alabama. No man was more esteemed, none more beloved. The record of his services, covering a period of nearly thirty years, discloses the fact that there were ties of a lasting character binding the deceased to the people among whom he lived.

Upon what foundation did they rest? What was the secret of his power? It was not because he possessed the gift of popular oratory, for while he spoke always with fullness and clearness and force, many others far less esteemed surpassed him in the ability to sway the masses of the people or select audiences with the splendors and charms of their eloquence.

Nor can it be said that it was owing to his achievements as a soldier, for while these were creditable and brilliant they were confined within circumscribed and narrow limits, while many others less beloved than he performed exploits that have linked their names to imperishable renown.

You can not ascribe it altogether to his robust common sense, his sound judgment, his zealous attention to daily tasks and engagements, to his qualifications and accomplishments as a lawyer, to his rectitude and public spirit, nor to his well known fidelity to friendships, for these were qualities possessed by hundreds who failed to make any impression whatever upon the public consideration.

To what then can we attribute his popularity and usefulness as a public man? It is true that his intellectual endowments commanded respect, but the source of his superiority is to be found in the resources of a matchless character. In this respect he had few equals and no superiors. Representative and typical of the better elements and aspirations of the people, he was their cherished favorite, for they saw in him the finished product of the civilization—the moral and intellectual forces of the society which they composed. For it may be said that as a general rule public men are the logical expressions of the tone and temper, the outgrowth of the local conditions and habits and culture and institutions of the people, and indicate their characteristics and qualities as surely as certain plants and fruits and trees do particular soils and climates.

His family had emigrated from about Fredericksburg, a part of the Old Dominion which has been prolific in men celebrated for all the virtues that adorn human nature as well as polished manners and intellectual accomplishments. They belonged to the country people of Virginia who have given to the world names that command its admiration and homage. But of those who composed that remarkable class how many there were who neither sought nor would accept public stations, but who were content to remain on their plantations pursuing their daily avocations and contributing to the welfare of their neighborhoods; distinguished alike for their fondness for classical learning, their hospitality, a certain reserve and stateliness of manner, and high moral standards—men who have left their impress upon country life throughout the South, the George Washingtons and the George Masons of private life, whose virtues fertilized the soil from which these great characters sprung and made of Virginia in some sense what Ithaca was to Ulysses—

A rough, wild nurse-land, but whose crops are men.

Inheriting traditions so elevating and representing a people themselves intelligent, brave, and virtuous, how could he prevaricate or attempt to deceive or descend to subterfuge or play the demagogue or betray any trust or fail of duty anywhere or his name be less than what it was—the synonym for honor.

The country can never forget the magnificent example of heroic devotion to duty left by his kinsman Capt. William Louis Herndon, who sacrificed his own life to save the passengers of the ill-fated steamer the Central America which went down in a terrific gale on our coast in 1857. It will be remembered with what methodical care and cool intrepidity he made all the arrangements for the safety of the passengers, insisting that the women and children should be rescued first and then the other passengers and finally the crew, and how at last, when the foundering ship had become unmanageable and was about to be ingulfed and it was apparent that all must instantly perish and his men besought him to abandon her and to save himself for the sake of his wife and children, his brave spirit, deaf to all entreaties, heard above the roar of the tempest the call of honor and duty, and, obeying, met his death like a martyr.

Col. THOMAS H. HERNDON had a spirit equally unselfish and courageous. I well remember during the evacuation of the lines near Spanish Fort, in Mobile Bay, in the closing hours of the civil war, the commander called for volunteers for a perilous service, and that Colonel HERNDON came forward and in a quiet and modest manner offered to undertake the duty, and performed it with such skill and heroism that he saved the lives of hundreds of his comrades, a duty the performance of which could bring no éclat, no public distinction, no governmental rewards, and that appeared to involve the certain loss of his own life. I doubt if he ever alluded to the circumstance. Such was the man. His whole character may be summed up in one word: He was a gentleman, respecting all the ties of life, honoring all its obligations, and knowing no fear but the fear of God. He realized all our ideas of an American gentleman called from the walks of private life into the public service, bringing with him that exquisite sensibility, that genuine benevolence, that genial tolerance, that scorn of deceit and vulgarity, that brave devotion to principle which characterized the good people who upheld and honored and loved him as their Representative and by whom they were themselves honored. He was the embodiment of that ideal character drawn by the master-hand of Geoffrey Chaucer over five hundred years ago:

A knight ther was, and that a worthy man,
That from the tyme that he ferst bigan
To ryden out, he lovede chyvelrye,
Trouthe and honour, fredom and curtesie.
* * * * *
And though that he was worthy he was wys,
And of his port as meke as is a mayde,
He never yit no vilonye ne sayde,
In al his lyf, unto no maner wight.
He was a veray parfit gentil knight.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, the imperfection of human language is so great that even on ordinary occasions and subjects we all feel that we can not give expression to our thoughts and feelings. I never felt so keenly the poverty of speech as I do to-day. My heart is so full of the memories of the good man whose untimely death has been just officially announced in the Senate that I can not say half that I feel about him.

THOMAS H. HERNDON was my warm personal friend long before either he or I came to Washington in an official character. I am aware that occasions like this are often employed to speak of virtues and character officially. The service that I perform to-day is not an official or lip service; it comes from my heart. Mr. HERNDON and I lived very near to each other. A surveyor's line, a few miles, and separate State organization were all that separated us. Occasionally he came to the bar at my home and more frequently I went to the bar at his. If there is anything that tests the quality of true friendship it is the intercourse of professional life.

The professional man who shows to the world that he is above that littleness of mind and heart which makes some men incapable of according to others the credit which is due to them for their talents and worth is the possessor of great and uncommon virtue. Mr. HERNDON was a man of great generosity, high character, and extensive attainments. In the city in which he lived, one of the foremost in the South, he was beloved by everybody for the purity of his private life, his eminent professional ability, as well as for the broad conservative principles which he adhered to after he entered public life. He was a man of genuine convictions and high sense of honor, and I do not think that he ever cast a vote or made a speech that did not emanate from his heart and with the sole purpose of advancing the interests of his country. He had few of the qualities of a trained politician. He was a man who would never act an insincere part to gain favor in any quarter.

He often said to me when here that there was much about public life that was distasteful to him because he found that it was difficult for a mind like his to conform to political methods and to do all that usage had sanctioned to win popular applause. In his intercourse with his fellow-men he was modest and unobtrusive, and so perfectly conscious was he at all times of the purity of his own character and the integrity of his principles, that he made no effort to impress them upon the minds of others.

He did not belong to that class of public men who suddenly build themselves up by sensations and little methods and then fall to pieces by the weight of their own dullness and incapacity as soon as they become known. His was the slow, steady, but certain growth which always follows the exertions of real character and merit; and had health and life permitted him to develop his fine abilities in the field of politics, he would have occupied a position in the councils of the country that would have given strength, courage, and power to all those who labor to infuse dignity, wisdom, independent spirit, impartial and temperate judgment, as well as genuine patriotism, into the administration of the affairs of government.

I have no hesitation in saying that in all the relations of life, private, social, professional, and political, Mr. HERNDON was one of the best men I ever knew. He was a scholar without affectation or pedantry; a Christian without intolerance or bigotry; a lawyer upright and fearless, ever commanding the confidence of the court, and who was never known to neglect or betray the interests of a client. The loveliness of his domestic life was only equaled by the purity of his professional and political character. He had strong convictions as a party man, but they were never exhibited in undignified or intemperate disputation. He was always true to the principles of his party, but they never carried him far enough to prevent him from doing full justice to those who differed from him. I have in my memory an instance of his impartiality and the freedom of his character from all taint of that littleness and hate which too often spring from party differences. It is only the man of real brain and heart that knows how and where to draw the line which separates private worth and integrity from party principles and responsibility.

When an appointment was to be made to a great judicial office from among the leading Republicans of the country I remember my deceased friend coming here from his business and his home to give his personal testimony of the worth and character of the person who was finally appointed, and without the knowledge of the latter. "Go with me," he said to me, "to official quarters; tell them who I am, so that I can speak, after long experience at the bar over which this gentleman presides as a judge, of his great ability, integrity, and purity of character." The moral of this ought not to pass without observation. It is this: That after all that has been said touching the treatment of United States officers in the South, whenever a gentleman is sent there he never fails to inspire confidence and receive justice. Long before either Mr. HERNDON or myself contemplated entering the field of politics we were professional friends and often engaged together at the bar. He was the most conscientious lawyer I ever knew. He would not address an argument to a court unless he had the clearest conviction not only of the justice but of the law of the case.

I was once his associate in an admiralty cause before the United States circuit court of Alabama. The equity of the case was clearly with our client, who was the victim of a gross fraud about to be consummated and carried through the forms of law. In arranging about the argument he said to me, with great emotion, "The justice and right of the case are clearly with us, but I have great doubt in regard to the legal principle for which you contend, and while I will assist you in every way in my power I must leave the argument to you." We gained the case before a full court. "You never could have succeeded," said he, "unless you were before a court that had the courage and justice to follow the examples of Lord Mansfield, who, putting aside the hard principles of the common law, declared that he never would permit a trustee to recover in ejectment against his cestui que trust in possession of the estate."

Mr. President, my poor offering to the memory of THOMAS H. HERNDON this day is not what I could wish it to be. Had I the language of a Webster or Choate I could not do justice to my feelings for the memory of this honest, true man. I have seen too much of the hollowness, the treachery, the insincerity of the human heart not to hold in proper estimation the character of the deceased. The House of Representatives has had and now has many men better known to the world for long public service and showing of talents than my departed friend; but, sir, neither that body nor this at any time in our history had a member who in all the high qualities of genuine manhood was the superior of the deceased. I do not speak of course about intellectual powers, for it is well known that a bright mind and a rotten heart have often been found together, but I speak of those great moral qualities which make friendship steadfast and enduring, charity boundless, religion tolerant, politics respectable, human nature itself worthy of its Divine Creator. It matters not where such a man is born, his home is the universe; responsive sympathies and open arms and warm hearts will greet him in every clime. And when death ends his earthly career and he enters into a better and happier life beyond the grave, the ministering angels around the throne of God kneel in solemn heavenly reverence and pay homage to his labors and his virtues as his soul passes the awful portals of eternity.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, the custom of the two Houses of Congress claims a suspension of our duties to the living that we may pay our last sad tribute to the memory of the dead. This is a mournful duty to all of us, and to me it is especially painful. My recollection of THOMAS H. HERNDON is so fresh I have not yet been able to realize the melancholy fact that he is gone from us forever. My relations with him had grown to be so intimate, cordial, and confiding it will take a long time to efface from my memory the impression that he still lives. How often are we reminded by the appearance of the merciless Destroyer "what shadows we are and what shadows we pursue." And yet we press on, grasping these shadows as if they were priceless jewels, and making our preparations to live as if our earthly existence were immortal.

What a striking illustration is furnished in this delusion of the beautiful truth that "we are fearfully and wonderfully made." How utterly blind and helpless we feel when confronted as we are every moment of our existence with the bewildering mysteries of our creation. If we had been so constituted as to be able to understand the delusive and unsatisfying nature of all the earthly objects of our desires, aspirations, and pursuits, and had been made capable of accepting and acting upon the truth as it really is in the beginning of our lives, who could comprehend or imagine the effects of such a radical change in our capacity and knowledge upon our lives and destinies. No higher wisdom could have been shown in the visible works of creation than is seen in the wonderful perfection of the adaptation of material elements and objects to our wants and aspirations and in the unchangeable affinities existing in the mysterious and incomprehensible combinations of mind and matter. How unwilling we are to accept the undeniable truth that disappointments, reverses, failures, trials, sorrows, and troubles of all kinds are inseparable from our existence because they are indispensable agencies and influences employed in the execution of immutable laws and the consummation of the designs of an all-wise Providence.

These reflections remind us that there is a philosophy in life and death that furnishes more or less consolation and compensation to alleviate our sorrows and reconcile us to our losses. Every human life is a history, and in that of our lamented friend, which has been portrayed with so much force and fidelity by my colleague, there is everything to love and admire and nothing wanting in qualities or action that a longer lease of life could have supplied to make a character more deserving our commemoration. I never knew a more perfectly organized man than THOMAS H. HERNDON. There were remarkable uniformity and harmony in all his faculties. His natural endowments have been excelled in degree but not in quality, and their combination made an extraordinary man. He was kind, gentle, polite, liberal, and unselfish. He had a keen sense of right, justice, honor, and duty, supported by strong convictions and affections and unfaltering courage and manhood. His powers of thought were remarkable for activity, clearness, and accuracy.

His natural gifts were developed and greatly improved and embellished by educational cultivation and acquirements and by upright and honorable living and intercourse. His most conspicuous traits were strong convictions, sound judgment, spotless integrity, scrupulous sense of duty, and faultless manhood. These qualities established him above suspicion in the esteem and confidence of every person who knew him personally or by reputation. He was social, genial, and refined in his intercourse with all classes, and enjoyed from the beginning of his manhood merited popularity with the people under whose scrutiny and with whose support he grew to distinction. As a friend, he was always true under any trial. As a citizen, he was exemplary, public spirited, and useful. No man was ever happier in his domestic relations. As a husband and parent, he was kind, indulgent, and affectionate.

As a lawyer he was efficient, faithful, and successful. As a representative in the Legislature of his native State and in the constitutional convention of 1875 and in the other House of Congress, he devoted all his powers of mind and heart to the honor, rights, interest, and welfare of his constituents. As a confederate officer and soldier, he verified on many battlefields the highest qualities of manhood and patriotism. In his protracted illness and sufferings and in full view of certain death, his heroic nature maintained its supremacy and suppressed all proof that death had any sting or the grave any victory.

I move the adoption of the resolutions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions submitted by the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

The resolutions were agreed to unanimously.

Mr. MORGAN. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of THOMAS H. HERNDON, the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to unanimously; and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 18, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BRIDGE OVER MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. RYAN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 2031) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near Sibley, in the State of Missouri. The bill has been unanimously approved by the Committee on Commerce and has all the usual safeguards.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful for the Kansas City, Topeka and Western Railroad Company, a corporation duly and legally incorporated under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Kansas, its assigns or successors, to construct and maintain a bridge, and approaches thereto, over the Missouri River at or near Sibley, in the county of Jackson, in said State. Said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the passage of railroad trains, and, at the option of the persons by whom it may be built, may be used for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, and for foot-passengers, for such reasonable rates of toll as may be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under this act and subject to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States, or passengers or freight passing over said bridge, than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroad or public highways leading to the said bridge; and it shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-roads in the United States.

SEC. 3. That if said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, the spans thereof shall not be less than three hundred feet in length in the clear, and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river. The lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge shall be at least fifty feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, and the bridge shall be at right angles to and its piers parallel with the current of the river: Provided, That if the same shall be constructed as a draw-bridge, the draw or pivot pier shall be at or near the shore nearest the channel of the river where, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, the passage through the draw at that point can be consistently maintained; if not so constructed, then the draw-pier to be in the main channel, and the opening or passage-way to be so protected that water craft can be worked through it by lines when not safe to pass otherwise; and the spans shall not be less than one hundred and sixty feet in length in the clear, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with and the bridge itself at right angles to the current of the river, and the spans shall not be less than ten feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge: Provided also, That said draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passing of boats; and said company or corporation shall maintain, at its own expense, from sunset till sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Light-House Board shall prescribe. No bridge shall be erected or maintained under the authority of this act which shall at any time substantially or materially obstruct the free navigation of said river; and if any bridge erected under such authority shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, obstruct such navigation, he is hereby authorized to cause such change or alteration of said bridge to be made as will effectually obviate such obstruction; and all such alterations shall be made, and all such obstructions be removed, at the expense of the owner or owners of such bridge. And in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, caused or alleged to be caused by said bridge, the case may be brought in the district court of the United States of the State of Missouri in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge may be located: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to repeal or modify any of the provisions of law now existing in reference to the protection of the navigation of rivers or to exempt this bridge from the operation of the same.

SEC. 4. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridge and the several railroad companies, or any one of them, desiring such use, shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War, upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties.

SEC. 5. That any bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said river as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of the bridge, and a map of the location, giving, for the space of one mile above and one mile below the proposed location, the topography of the banks of the river, the shore-lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the currents at all stages, and the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War the bridge shall not be built; and should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of construction, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 6. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is the bill reported with amendments?

Mr. RYAN. There are some verbal amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the understanding that there are no material amendments to the bill I do not object to its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will be reported.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In section 1, line 8, strike out "in said State" and insert "in the State of Missouri."

In section 3, after the word "prescribed," in line 27, insert the following: "And such sheer-booms or other structures as may be necessary to safely guide vessels, rafts, and other water crafts through the said draw openings, and as shall be designated and required by the Secretary of War."

Add at the end of section 6 the following:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to abridge any constitutional power which either Congress or the State of Missouri may have over the regulation of charges for freight or passengers over said bridge."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendments reported by the committee were adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RYAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VIOLATION OF INTERNAL-REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 6370) to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal-revenue laws. Before the bill is read I desire to state it has the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Revision of the Laws, the indorsement of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the indorsement of the Secretary of the Treasury; that it makes no appropriation out of the Treasury, and is in the interest of economy and the administration of the internal-revenue laws, and I think there can be no objection to it.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That no person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any crime arising under the internal-revenue laws of the United States unless the indictment is found or the information instituted within one year next after the commission of the offense, in all cases where the punishment is fine, or fine and imprisonment without labor, and within eighteen months next after the commission of the offense where the penalty is fine and imprisonment with labor.

SEC. 2. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act be, and are hereby, repealed.

The following amendments, reported by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, were read:

In line 6, strike out "one year" and insert "two years."

After the word "offense," in line 7, strike out these words: "in all cases where the punishment is fine, or fine and imprisonment without labor, and within eighteen months next after the commission of the offense where the penalty is fine and imprisonment with labor," and insert the following:

"Provided, That the time during which the person committing the offense is beyond the reach of legal process shall not be taken as any part of the time limited by law for the commencement of such action."

Mr. REED. I should like to hear the letter expressing the approval of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] reserves the right to object until the letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall be read.

Mr. McMILLIN. I am satisfied there will be no objection when the letters of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue are read.

Mr. REED. I should like to hear the Commissioner's letter read. As I understand, this makes a statute of limitation of two years.

Mr. McMILLIN. Of two years. The bill was submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he submitted it to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and they suggested that in place of making the limitation one year where the penalty was fine or fine and imprisonment without labor, and eighteen months where it was fine and imprisonment with labor, those provisions should be amended and the limitation should be made in all cases two years. With that amendment and the further amendment that is reported not to let the statute of limitations run where the party flees beyond the jurisdiction of the court the committee recommend that the bill pass.

Mr. REED. What is the limitation now?

Mr. McMILLIN. In most cases it is five years. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose letter was indorsed by the Secretary of the Treasury and by him referred to the committee, says:

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the reference to me, for report of my views thereon, of bill H. R. 6370, "to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal-revenue laws," and to reply that my views remain as set forth in my annual report to you for the year ended June 30, 1883. They are as follows:

"I respectfully suggest that Congress be requested to enact a statute, fixing the limitation for the prosecution of offenses against the revenue laws at a much less period than five years, as now provided by law, except in cases where the accused places himself beyond the jurisdiction of the court of the district where the offense was committed. I am informed by judges of the United States district courts that in nearly every instance where a conviction has been secured the offense was committed within two years before the indictment was found. Cases older than two years are almost invariably lost by the Government. It is also very difficult in such cases to prevent abuses, whereby the costs of prosecution are increased, and, ultimately, the ends of justice defeated. I am of the opinion that a shorter period of limitation would be much better in many ways, and greatly lessen the expense of such prosecution to the Government."

As to the exact period of limitation—whether as contemplated in this bill, one year in most internal-revenue cases, or a somewhat longer period—that may well be left to the wisdom of Congress; but I am firmly convinced that a modification of the laws on that subject as they now exist would be beneficial to the interests of the revenue.

The Secretary of the Treasury says in a letter addressed to the chairman of the committee:

Your letter of the 4th instant is received, in which you submit for my opinion thereon bill H. R. 6370, being "A bill to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal-revenue laws."

I have the honor to inclose herewith a report on the bill of the views of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in which I concur. A limitation of two years after these offenses are committed was suggested to Congress in my annual report of the finances for 1883, on page 44 thereof.

A proviso excepting cases in which the accused party places himself beyond the jurisdiction of the proper court should be inserted in the bill, so that nothing be left to construction that may be so easily provided for.

Mr. REED. I am satisfied now.

Mr. LAIRD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. As you understand this law does it include felonies?

Mr. McMILLIN. It includes all offenses arising on account of violation of the internal-revenue laws, both felonies and misdemeanors. The gentleman will find by examination of the statutes that it is very difficult to determine what offenses are embraced by the term he uses. I have found the word "felony" in only one or two of the statutes. Generally the grade of punishment is designated by the expression "with labor" or "without labor."

Mr. CALKINS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether there is any provision in the bill with reference to pending cases.

Mr. McMILLIN. There is no provision relative to pending cases. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue did not suggest any, nor did the Secretary of the Treasury. In fact, he says that in more than four-fifths of the cases where they are more than two years old the parties are turned loose after indictment and the Government forced to pay the costs.

Mr. CALKINS. It seems to me there ought to be a saving clause in this bill with reference to all pending cases. Probably such an amendment might meet no objection; and I should not like to have the bill passed in its present form without such a provision.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the gentleman will prepare such an amendment as he desires I should be disposed to accept it rather than have the bill fail for want of consideration. It is not the intention to encourage lawlessness, but to prevent oppression. It is also intended to prevent the Government from being mulcted in costs and the parties being prosecuted without sufficient reason.

Mr. CALKINS. With the amendment I have suggested, I should have no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. LAIRD. If legal proceedings be instituted in the time of the limitation we ought to save an action to the Government. I do not see any such provision in the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. The bill makes provision for the very point to which the gentleman calls attention. It provides that no person shall be prosecuted unless the information be instituted within two years next after the commission of the offense.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill which has been read?

Mr. CALKINS. I shall object, unless an amendment is agreed to that the provisions of this bill shall not apply to any cases now pending.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] will please send up the amendment he seeks to have adopted.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the first question is upon the amendments reported from the committee.

Mr. CALKINS. It is understood that my amendment is accepted; otherwise I must object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] to accept it, but it must be adopted by a vote of the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes allowed me for the discussion of this bill I wish first to thank the House for the great courtesy shown me by giving unanimous consent to have it considered out of its regular order and in preference to other important business. I am grateful not only on my own account, but on account of the thousands of helpless citizens all over the country who are dragged from their homes, in many cases hundreds of miles, to Federal courts to be tried for stale and trivial offenses. Those living in cities and near capitals have little idea of the oppressions of Federal courts. My candid opinion is that the last century has not devised any other such engine of judicial oppression as this. Men are hunted down at home, dragged from the fireside or the plow to be tried or as a witness in some petty case of five years' antiquity. The internal system has been administered with such brutality as that the men who devised it are now berating it as an infernal system.

Mr. Speaker, when I came here as a Representative my first effort was to get rid of the oppressions provided against in this bill. I then enlisted for the war, and intend never to ground the arms of my opposition to this judicial tyranny. I think, sir, some other method of collecting internal revenue should be devised. I have already urged that in an argument before the Ways and Means Committee, and hope something can be accomplished. They tell us that to abolish the entire internal-revenue system would cause a deficiency of $50,000,000 a year. If this be so, and it is impossible to get along without the money thus raised for the present, I hope we will at least have their and your cooperation in getting rid of all useless officers and in devising a simple and just means of collecting these taxes which shall not be oppressive to the citizen. If that is not done there is a power in this country which will rise up and wipe from existence every one of these laws, which are now so construed in too many cases as to enable an armed mob to invade the home of the citizen, destroy his property, and make him a captive without process. This bill is intended to protect the citizen from improper prosecution. It is just to the citizen, eminently proper, and I hope will pass.

Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding a portion of the letters of the Secretary and Commissioner of Internal Revenue have already been read, I send to the Clerk to be read the report of the Committee on Revision of the Laws.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Revision of the Laws, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6370) to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal-revenue laws, having considered the same, give the following reasons for its passage, as recommended by the committee:

The limitation now fixed by law for prosecutions for a large number of offenses against the internal-revenue laws is five years. This, your committee thinks, is too long a period, as it results in stale and vexatious prosecutions, which end, and could end, in nothing but the harassing of the citizen and the accumulation of large cost-bills, which the Government in most cases has to pay. But your committee thought it prudent to submit the bill to the Secretary of the Treasury for his opinion. He, in turn, called on the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the following are the letters of both approving the bill, with some slight modifications, which your committee have adopted:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 7, 1884.

SIR: Your letter of the 4th instant is received, in which you submit for my opinion thereon bill H. R. 6370, being "a bill to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal-revenue laws."

I have the honor to inclose herewith a report on the bill of the views of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in which I concur. A limitation of two years after these offenses are committed was suggested to Congress in my annual report of the finances for 1883, on page 44 thereof.

A proviso excepting cases in which the accused party places himself beyond the jurisdiction of the proper court should be inserted in the bill, so that nothing be left to construction that may be so easily provided for.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. J. FOLGER, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM C. OATES,
Chairman Committee on Revision of the Laws, House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, April 5, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the reference to me, for report of my views thereon, of bill H. R. 6370, "to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal-revenue laws," and to reply that my views remain as set forth in my annual report to you for the year ended June 30, 1883. They are as follows:

"I respectfully suggest that Congress be requested to enact a statute fixing the limitation for the prosecution of offenses against the revenue laws at a much less period than five years, as now provided by law, except in cases where the accused places himself beyond the jurisdiction of the court of the district where the offense was committed. I am informed by judges of the United States district courts that in nearly every instance where a conviction has been secured the offense was committed within two years before the indictment was found. Cases older than two years are almost invariably lost by the Government. It is also very difficult in such cases to prevent abuses, whereby the costs of prosecution are increased, and, ultimately, the ends of justice defeated. I am of the opinion that a shorter period of limitation would be much better in many ways, and greatly lessen the expense of such prosecutions to the Government."

As to the exact period of limitation—whether as contemplated in this bill, one year in most internal-revenue cases, or a somewhat longer period—that may well be left to the wisdom of Congress; but I am firmly convinced that a modification of the laws on that subject as they now exist would be beneficial to the interests of the revenue.

The papers referred to me are herewith returned.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

WALTER EVANS, Commissioner.

Hon. CHARLES J. FOLGER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

It will thus be seen that, according to the testimony of these high officials who are at the head of this system of internal revenue, almost every prosecution begun after a lapse of more than two years ends in vexatious failure. All the information your committee have been able to get on the subject corroborates this. They therefore recommend the amendment of the bill by striking out the words "one year," in line 6, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "two years;" and by striking out lines 7, 8, 9, and 10 and inserting in lieu the following words: "Provided, The time during which the person committing the offense is beyond the reach of legal process shall not be taken as any part of the time limited by law for the commencement of such action."

And when so amended they recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, this is eminently a proper measure, and had it been adopted many years ago the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice of this House would have found a great deal less to do.

Mr. REED (in his seat). That would have been a public misfortune.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] says that would have been a public misfortune. Perhaps it might have been.

I desire to call the attention of the House, and of the Republican side especially, to the fact that it can not afford to defend any man in its party who has been found guilty of corrupt practices. Prior to the year 1876 it was a very common occurrence for men to be arrested for the most trivial and technical violations of law and carried to the most remote United States commissioner in the State of Kentucky for preliminary trial. There was evidently collusion between the district attorney, who had a brother who was United States commissioner in Louisville, and the marshal, who had deputies to divide with him the costs.

That method of plundering the public Treasury was carried to such an extent that when I was elected to the Forty-fourth Congress the petitions and complaints from the State of Kentucky were so numerous that I was compelled, contrary to my inclination, compelled in spite of my prejudices in favor of the then district attorney and marshal of Kentucky, to ask that the Department of Justice would direct to be made an investigation of the charges of gross malfeasance in office. That investigation was had, and be it said to the credit of the Republican administration then in power the corrupt officials were turned out of office. G. C. Wharton, United States district attorney, was removed; and Eli H. Murray, United States marshal, was permitted to resign.

What was the state of the case at that time? If I understand the bill presented by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] it is intended to remove the temptation now for such violations. At that time, although there was a United States commissioner in the little town of London, Ky., one hundred and sixty miles from Louisville, it was customary to take the men arrested beyond and in the vicinity of London by the commissioner there to the city of Louisville for the purpose of having simply a preliminary examination. If one was arrested at the head of the Big Sandy or Kentucky Rivers he was taken to Louisville for the preliminary examination, although to get there he might have to go through the town of Mount Sterling, where there was a commissioner, which was one hundred and thirty-three miles from Louisville. What was that done for? For no other purpose than to run up the costs and to get fees from the Government. That was changed somewhat after the investigation which I set on foot during my term in the Forty-fourth Congress. It was changed so that the person arrested had a right to a preliminary trial before the commissioner nearest his home.

Notwithstanding these changes by the Department of Justice, requiring the man arrested to be tried before the nearest commissioner, arrests were frequently made and prosecutions instituted simply to make costs, for we find the following statement in the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of November 25, 1881:

The district attorney is made the judge of the propriety of commencing a criminal prosecution against a citizen on account of which he and the marshal will receive pay from the Government whether the party be guilty or innocent. These officers may prefer complaints against citizens, cause United States commissioners to issue warrants, may arrest and examine the parties before the commissioner, and the district attorney, marshal, guard, witnesses, and the commissioner will all get their fees from the Government, even though the party arrested be discharged.

He says further:

Instances have been brought to my attention where numerous prosecutions have been instituted for the most trivial violations of law, and the arrested parties taken long distances and subjected to great inconvenience and expense, not in the interest of the Government, but apparently for no other reason than to make costs.

There is an indictment against certain Federal officials by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who ought to know all about this matter. It was not made in 1876, when I asked for this investigation, but in 1881.

Now to come more directly to the measure before the House. This bill will go far to prevent senseless prosecutions, more properly called persecutions, by corrupt district attorneys and their relatives who are commissioners, and marshals and their willing deputies from hunting up cases five years old, where citizens may have been indicted for trivial or technical violations like the selling of one pint of whisky, or for selling five pounds of tobacco which may have been raised on his own farm; to prevent them from hunting up citizens remotely located—sometimes three hundred miles—from where there is a Federal court, and dragging them before that court for no other purpose than to make costs and get their fees, even though the party arrested be innocent.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I insist that order shall be preserved while the gentleman is speaking. I want to hear his account of Republican officials.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order, so that the gentleman may be heard.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I regret exceedingly to be compelled to take advantage of this occasion to speak of a matter which is supposed by some to be a personal matter, although it is not, but is directly related to the bill under consideration.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I desire to ask my friend from Kentucky what length of time he wants. I am willing to yield to him a reasonable time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has an hour.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I thought the gentleman was speaking in my time.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I am not aware that I am dependent upon the gentleman's courtesy.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I did not understand that I had yielded the floor.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I am occupying the floor in my own right.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I simply want to proceed with this matter as rapidly as we can.

Mr. GUENTHER. Is this by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The bill is being considered under the rules of the House.

Mr. GUENTHER. Is objection in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The Chair asked for objection, and none was made.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope I shall not be interrupted. I know the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] is in a hurry to pass this bill; I am not trying to defeat it. I am willing to go a little further than his bill goes. If the gentleman will fix the limitation at one year, I will go with him; and if the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] be withdrawn I will still vote for the measure. The reasons I am stating as having force in 1875 have force to-day, though not in the same degree; that is all.

Mr. VANCE. Will you not vote to abolish the entire thing?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. No, sir. We need revenue to pay the public debt and Government expenses. But I would abolish the fee system and abolish all taxes on tobacco.

Mr. VANCE. Are you not willing to continue the tax with the plan of collection simplified?

A MEMBER. Leaving the payment wholly voluntary!

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. That has nothing to do with this question. Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall ask the privilege of incorporating in my remarks voluminous extracts from the testimony which has been taken before the Springer investigating committee. I hope the chairman of that committee is now present. Yes, I see his smiling countenance. I wish to quote from the testimony before that committee, because it is the most extraordinary proceeding perhaps that was ever permitted. A committee appointed to investigate expenditures in the Department of Justice undertook to investigate the expenses of marshals and district attorneys for Kentucky. They called me before that committee. For what purpose? The following will perhaps throw light on the question:

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 28, 1884.

SIR: I am instructed by the Committee on Expenditures Department of Justice to request you to appear before the committee to-morrow (Tuesday) morning, January 29, 1884, at 10 o'clock a. m., to testify in the matter of the accounts of the United States court officials in Kentucky.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
W. M. SPRINGER, Chairman.

Attest:
J. B. IRWIN, Clerk Committee.

Hon. JOHN D. WHITE,
House of Representatives.

I did not receive that notice in time to appear on the day stated, and so a second notice was sent to me.

On the 30th of last January I testified before that committee as to the source of my information on the subject for which I was summoned to give testimony.

The chairman of that committee [Mr. SPRINGER] asked me this question:

Since you have been a Representative in Congress have you been informed of the existence of any abuses or irregularities in the administration of the office of United States marshal and United States deputy marshal?

Referring to Kentucky, I testified that I had been so informed. They asked me for the names of witnesses. I gave them the names of reliable witnesses. Did they summon those witnesses? Oh, no! but they determined to see Mr. Murray. [Laughter.]

I reviewed the investigation that I had set on foot in 1876, and showed that that investigation resulted in the removal of G. C. Wharton, United States district attorney, who was afterward reappointed by Mr. Hayes and confirmed by a Democratic Senate, and then hired by the whisky ring to lobby the unlimited bond-extension bill through the Forty-seventh Congress. I reviewed the case in which United States Marshal Murray, now governor of Utah, after an investigation by the general agent of the Department of Justice, and not to gratify me—for I must confess that in the beginning I was loath to believe these prominent officials guilty of malfeasance in office—was permitted to resign, although Mr. Harlan, then an attorney for this man, pleaded that he should be allowed to remain, and hunted up influential men to try to get him retained. Still, when Mr. Hayes had become President Mrs. Hayes had Murray appointed governor of Utah. [Laughter.] Go to the Department of the Interior, and not a single line can be found recommending Mr. Murray as governor of Utah when he was appointed the first time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, did they call the witnesses who I told them knew all about these facts? Did they call Mr. Samuel Crail, clerk of the United States court, Louisville, Ky.? Did they call H. F. Finley, now the judge of the fifteenth judicial district in the State of Kentucky, one of the purest, bravest, and best Republicans in the United States, and who made the charges in May, 1877, as appears in my testimony, and which I have incorporated in my remarks—did they call him? Did they call Henry Diven, who claimed to know, personally, the truth of the charges regarding the official conduct of Marshal Murray? Did they call anybody who claimed to know, personally, about these matters? Did they call the United States commissioner at London, by whose office many of the arrested persons were carried one hundred and sixty miles to Louisville? Did they call Maj. A. T. Wood, the United States commissioner at Mount Sterling, through whose town they carried the prisoners from that end of the State? No, sir. Then, what did they do? Why, they called Mr. Murray! [Laughter.] Mr. Murray was allowed to come before the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice and read a long speech, evidently prepared by his attorney, and which covers more than twenty printed pages, to try to unload his guilt upon others, and to abuse witnesses who had testified for the Government against him.

What next? They called in John Harlan, a Justice of the Supreme Court. And what does he say? Why, that he had been Murray's attorney, and that he had come from Louisville, Ky., to Washington in 1876 "for the purpose of seeing the Attorney-General touching the charges which had been made in the public prints affecting Murray's conduct as marshal for the State of Kentucky;" and that Attorney-General Taft had told him that he did not believe that Murray had "knowingly made any improper charges." But I will not undertake to quote from memory, and shall give Justice Harlan's testimony in full in the appendix to my remarks.

I refer to this matter because that committee has decided to stop the investigation; and the reason they decided to stop it was because Governor Murray, one of the men under investigation, came before the committee and said he was not guilty, and then undertook to prove by John M. Harlan, of the Supreme Court of the United States, and by the Speaker of this House, who did not pretend to have any knowledge of the facts or to have investigated this thing, that he had a good character. The committee then resolved to close that investigation.

There is the conclusion of the greatest farce under the name of an honest and thorough investigation that I have ever known.

Why was Mr. Speaker CARLISLE called before that committee? To tell what he knew about the facts? Not at all. But to give a good character to a man who had read a statement the day before to the committee to refute definite charges against him for plundering the United States Treasury out of thousands of dollars and who was turned out of office by President Grant after an investigation of his official conduct by the Department of Justice in 1876.

When the investigation by the committee of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is chairman was about to begin I said on the floor of this House January 21, 1884:

I shall cheerfully support the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]. I desire to call the attention of the House and of the country to the fact that at the last session of Congress I introduced the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to investigate the accounts of the United States commissioners, clerks, marshals, and district attorney for the State of Kentucky from June 1, 1870, to January 1, 1882."

I did not then ask for an investigation as to the whole United States, but I am glad that the gentleman who has this subject in charge proposes now to ferret out the matter to the bottom. I believe that under the fee system thousands of dollars have been stolen from the United States Treasury by some Federal officials. I believe that a thorough investigation of the accounts of the Attorney-General or the records of the Treasury Department will show evidences of fraud resulting from the fee system. I do not think the last Congress did right to smother my resolution of inquiry, which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

I hope and believe that the gentleman who has charge of this matter will thoroughly and honestly endeavor to get to the bottom of the whole subject. And I believe that if he does so in regard to my own State he will find that men, notably the one to-day sitting as governor of Utah, and a man who was here last winter lobbying as a paid attorney of the whisky ring, late the United States marshal and United States district attorney for the State of Kentucky, will be shown to deserve the striped clothes of convicts in the penitentiary more than some who now wear them.

I hope that the Republicans of this House will join with the Democrats in investigating thoroughly every fraud that now stains the escutcheon of the Republican party.

It appears that my confidence in that committee was misplaced.

The following, which was thought good enough to send by telegraph to all parts of the country, is a specimen of Murray's voluminous testimony before the Springer committee:

Everybody has been heard, and it appears there is not one word by WHITE, or by any one else who pretends to have any personal knowledge, to prove any fact which will even tend to support one of these accusations.

George Q. Cannon, the so-called apostle of Mormon hierarchy; A. W. Gibson, whose name is only too well known here; JOHN D. WHITE, whose name alone is enough, and Henry Diven, a knave of the lower grade and less prominence—birds of foul omen and birds of ill omen—all, with Chase for an æolian attachment and aided by the moral support of the Mormon Church, through the presence here of CAINE, now Mormon Delegate in Congress, are actors in this scene. On Monday, January 21, 1884, the Hon. Mr. SPRINGER, chairman of this committee, reported to the House a resolution for authority to incur a certain expense in prosecuting the investigation into the expenditures in the Department of Justice. JOHN D. WHITE, having the floor, yielded to him to advocate the resolution, and took advantage of his position as a member of the House and of the fact that a statement from him as a Republican might be taken as an admission against a member of his party, to make in my absence, and as his testimony shows without any personal knowledge or any proofs, a coarse and brutal attack upon me, such as no one who has any claim to be considered a gentleman could ever be justified in making, except from personal knowledge or most convincing evidence.

In that speech he maliciously made statements which he knew were false and without the pretense of truth, and under the guise of a member of Congress indulged his base and cowardly personal enmity against me while I was at my post attending to my official duties in Utah. In this he served the lawless element in Utah as he served the moonshiners in Kentucky in 1876. He is a person with whom no gentleman can have any relations, wholly devoid of moral sensibility, and an irresponsible person, morally or intellectually. Where his real nature is known his praise is an injury and abuse by him an honor. But his utterances in the House of Representatives go to the country with the same weight which they never could have among people exposed to acquaintance with him.

Such slander as that, Mr. Speaker, does not affect me, but it may be and doubtless was a sweet morsel to the committee having the investigation in charge.

I wish the House and the country to know how this committee with the smiling boutonnière at its head [laughter and applause] proceeded to investigate expenditures in the Department of Justice and how they proceeded to get at the facts.

Mr. Speaker, I have not the honor of a personal acquaintance with Mr. Henry Diven. But it appears that he was a friend of Eli H. Murray's, and attended his wedding January 18, 1876, by the invitation which I hold in my hand.

The following letters will show that he is not considered a knave by Col. J. T. Buckner, of Louisville, Ky., one of the most prominent men in Kentucky to-day; nor by S. A. Whitfield, late revenue agent for Kentucky and now postmaster at Cincinnati, Ohio; nor by R. H. Crittenden, who it appears intrusted Diven with the control of the steamboat Alice until a sale was effected; nor by Col. W. A. Bullitt, late United States district attorney under Wharton; nor by Mr. G. K Chase, general agent of the Department of Justice, who was sent to Kentucky in 1876 to investigate the charges against certain Federal officials; nor by Mr. Brewster Cameron, the present general agent for the Department of Justice.

I ask the attention of the House to them:

LOUISVILLE, KY., April 12, 1884.

I send you papers, all of which show that I was appointed to the position long after Murray says he discharged me for stealing. After Colonel Buckner appointed me Murray went to him and said it was a great outrage to give me the place. Buckner told him he had been to Judge Barr and Wharton, who said I was a reliable man. Now, you must remember that Crittenden is a relative of Murray's, and if I had been discharged for stealing he would not have given me charge of that steamboat, for she was in a sinking condition, and I had to employ from five to twenty men for sixty-six days. (See Crittenden's order to me to release the boat. (Mr. WHITE, I have been the means of saving thousands of dollars to the United States, and you can see how I have been treated. I have three small children and no wife, and have to look for days' work.

Very respectfully,

HENRY DIVEN.

Hon. JOHN D. WHITE.

UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE,
COLLECTOR'S OFFICE, FIFTH DISTRICT KENTUCKY,
Louisville, October 1, 1877.

GENTLEMEN: Mr. Henry Diven is a special deputy of this district and authorized and empowered to investigate all violations of law in this district. I have instructed them to confer with you and all storekeepers and gaugers of the district for such aid and information as you can give. The deputy collectors are expected to use their active aid in securing the object of their appointment.

Respectfully,

J. T. BUCKNER, Collector.

Messrs. LEROY FRAYSER, BEN B. GRAY, GEORGE W. FOREMAN, D. H. HOWARD, Deputies.

UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE,
AGENT'S OFFICE, DISTRICT OF KENTUCKY,
Louisville, June 27, 1878.

To whom it may concern:

Henry Diven is in my employ as an internal-revenue officer for a period of thirty days from July 1, 1878, as per authority granted by honorable Commissioner of Internal Revenue in letter of June 22, 1878.

Mr. Diven has authority to visit and examine stock, books and papers, and premises of all persons having in their possession articles liable to tax under internal-revenue laws.

Respectfully,

S. A. WHITFIELD,
Revenue Agent, District of Kentucky.

UNITED STATES MARSHAL'S OFFICE,
DISTRICT OF KENTUCKY, February 18, 1881.

SIR: You will please deliver and turn over to Capt. A. H. Dugan or order the steamer Alice and all of her appurtenances now in your charge, he having become the purchaser of said boat, &c., at the sale this day made.

R. H. CRITTENDEN,
United States Marshal.

Mr. HENRY DIVEN.

A. M. DUGAN.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, January 20, 1882.

SIR: This will serve to introduce you to Mr. C. C. Lancaster, jr., special agent of this Department, who visits Kentucky upon business connected with the accounts of Marshal R. H. Crittenden. Please render him any service in your power.

Respectfully, &c.,

G. V. CHASE.

HENRY DIVEN, Esq., Louisville, Ky.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, March 30, 1882.

SIR: Mr. Lancaster, late acting special agent of this Department, has requested me to ask the Attorney-General to order the payment of $50 to you for services rendered the United States, through Mr. Lancaster, while he was engaged in the examination of the accounts of late United States marshal, Colonel Crittenden, of Kentucky.

Inasmuch as you have rendered valuable services to this Department the Attorney-General has approved the payment of the above sum, which you will doubtless receive in a week or ten days. If you do not, let me hear from you on the subject.

I am gratified to convey this information to you, and trust that you will promptly notify me whenever the interests of the United States are not being protected.

Mr. Lancaster has been to see me a number of times about this, and speaks in the highest terms of your fidelity to the Government.

Very respectfully,

BREWSTER CAMERON, General Agent.

HENRY DIVEN, Esq.,
Louisville, Ky.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, DISTRICT OF KENTUCKY,
Louisville, Ky., May 11, 1881.

DEAR COLONEL: This will be presented to you by Henry Diven, who is an applicant for the position of private policeman at the race-course during the coming races. I have known Diven for years, and know that you can trust him, and that what he promises or tells you can be relied upon. He was for years a deputy United States marshal, is familiar with the duties of the position which he seeks, and can be trusted to tell the truth under all circumstances.

He is a poor man with a family, and if you can give him this position it will greatly benefit him, and will oblige your friend,

W. A. BULLITT.

M. LEWIS CLARKE, Esq., Louisville, Ky.

Gentlemen seem to laugh at the idea of Diven's applying for the position of policeman at the Louisville race-course during the week of the races [laughter and applause], but I understand it is considered an important position by the average race-going Kentuckian. [Laughter.] I was never at a Kentucky horse-race in my life.

That letter is by Col. W. A. Bullitt, who was the assistant district attorney under Wharton for years. He was a colonel in the Union Army, and is well known in the city of Louisville. Did they call him? Not at all. Who did they call? Why, they called Mr. Murray. [Laughter.] Did they call Mr. Diven? Oh, no; Mr. Murray had said he was "a knave of lower degree and less prominence" than a member of this Congress.

I invite your attention to Diven's statement furnished to the Springer committee by Ralph Ballin from the files in the Department of Justice, as will be seen on page 191 of the testimony, and which I shall print in the appendix to my remarks.

But Mr. Speaker CARLISLE was called before the committee and asked to testify. As to what? As to his knowledge of the facts? Oh! no; but as to the character of the witness Murray.

Why was Mr. Speaker CARLISLE called before that committee? I will show you why. On the day before a man who had wronged the Government out of thousands of dollars, a man who had deputies prowling all over the State of Kentucky, with blank warrants returnable at Louisville for years, hunting up these technical violations of law—a man condemned by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, condemned by the Department of Justice, removed from office after an investigation by the proper officers of the Government—appeared before the investigating committee and made a special plea in his own defense, and needed a little help to be let down easy by that committee appointed to investigate expenditures in the Department of Justice.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I would like to know if this discussion is going on here under the rules of the House, and if a discussion on a pending measure permits persons to be arraigned here in this manner by a member who is addressing the House? If not, I call for the enforcement of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not been able to see up to this time any connection which the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky have with the bill now pending before the House.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Then I ask the Speaker to direct that the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky in future be directed to the bill under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that he will please conform to the rule of the House by confining himself to the question under debate.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If I am to be called to order by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and interrupted in the course of my remarks, I want to know it now; otherwise, if he is not entitled to occupy the floor in my time, I want him to sit down and allow me to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated that the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky so far did not appear to have any connection with the subject under debate.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. But I think I am to be the judge of that matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House is to be the judge of the matter.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If the House wants to call me to order, that is all right, and I will take my seat until the question is decided.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I call the gentleman from Kentucky to order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then I will take my seat until that question is decided.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky having been called to order, and having taken his seat, the question is, under the rules of the House, Shall the gentleman from Kentucky proceed in order?

The question was decided in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky, by consent of the House, will proceed in order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I thank the House for its courtesy. [Laughter.]

I think, sir, with all due deference to the Chair, that I have been confining myself to the question under debate, and that the point of order did not apply to me at all. I want to put my protest there.

Now, sir, I regret as much as anybody could regret anything to have to make these remarks upon this floor; but when my official integrity is questioned before a committee of this House I think I have the right to respond.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of order. I ask the Chair to rule whether the gentleman from Kentucky is in order or not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky has been permitted by the House to proceed in order, not otherwise. The remarks which the gentleman has been making would perhaps be proper, in the judgment of the Chair, if made in the nature of a personal explanation or on a discussion of the report of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice when presented. The Chair does not see how they can have any possible application to the merits of the bill under discussion. This is a bill simply to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal-revenue laws. The gentleman from Kentucky will proceed in order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. That leads me to make this remark, with all due reference to the Chair, that the difference between the vision of the Chair and my vision is that in my course in Congress I have been endeavoring to defend the rights of the poorest people in the State of Kentucky, and the Speaker has been endeavoring to get bills through Congress for the biggest whisky monopoly in the State of Kentucky.

Mr. MONEY. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I ask that the words of the gentleman from Kentucky be taken down by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair may be permitted, the Chair would prefer that the words be not taken down and that no notice be taken of them. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw my request; but I shall insist that the gentleman from Kentucky shall proceed in order or not proceed at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to enforce the rules of the House.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say one word on the point of order. The practice in the House has been when a member is recognized to speak for an hour that he can talk during that hour, and while it is the general rule that he must confine himself to the question before the House, yet so far as I have any knowledge it has always been within the discretion of the member talking as to how he should discuss that question. Certainly that has been the practice. If any other practice was to obtain, it would then be in the power of the Speaker or a majority to determine what line of argument the member on the floor should pursue; and perhaps it might be out of the power of the Speaker and of the majority of the House to discern wherein the remarks were relevant to the issue. It occurs to me it is the privilege of each member to determine for himself as to whether or not the line of argument he pursues is pertinent to the question before the House. I recollect the other day the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] in discussing the whisky-bond extension bill made a speech on the tariff. It has always been the practice to allow such latitude.

The SPEAKER. The rule which requires discussion to be confined to the question under debate is perhaps one of the most difficult rules to apply, because it is often very difficult and sometimes impossible to determine precisely when a gentleman on the floor departs from the question under debate. Therefore the Chair himself has never on any occasion interposed to prevent gentlemen from pursuing such a line of remark as they might see proper. In this instance, however, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] in front of the Chair insisted that the gentleman from Kentucky was not confining himself to the question under debate, and the Chair thought that in so far as the gentleman from Kentucky was discussing the characters of Diven, Chase, and others, his line of remark could have no bearing on the bill.

The Chair will always be disposed to give the utmost latitude to gentlemen on the floor; because what might seem to one gentleman entirely pertinent might seem to another wholly irrelevant. But when the gentleman from Pennsylvania made the point of order it was the duty of the Chair to decide it, his decision of course being subject to the revision of the House. The rule is very positive. The Chair will have it read.

The Clerk read clause one of Rule XIV, as follows:

1. When any member desires to speak or deliver any matter to the House, he shall rise and respectfully address himself to "Mr. Speaker," and, on being recognized, may address the House from any place on the floor or from the Clerk's desk, and shall confine himself to the question under debate, avoiding personality.

The SPEAKER. The practice to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] refers is a practice which has prevailed ever since the organization of the House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, but there is no practice, so far as the Chair knows, which authorizes gentlemen on the floor in the House itself to pursue any line of argument not relevant in some degree at least to the matter pending before the House.

Mr. YOUNG. If the theory of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] be correct, I was very badly treated myself on the floor the other day by the ruling of the Chair. I was endeavoring to addres the Chair the other day when a question of order was before the House, and I said to the Chair that it was not my purpose to confine my remarks strictly to the question of order, whereupon the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] objected to my speaking at all, and the Chair sustained that objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the decision of the Chair on that occasion was correct. The gentleman from Tennessee could not under the rule, if objection was made, proceed to discuss any proposition except the pending question.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, rose.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I hope all this does not come out of my time.

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. On the question of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] I want to say this: I have nothing but the kindliest relations to the gentleman from Kentucky. But I do not think the time of this House should be taken up by any gentleman on this floor to settle a private difference he has with a citizen of the United States, whether in official or in private life. A member of Congress can not be called to account even in courts for what he may say here relative to the character of a citizen or an officer of the Government. He has the utmost liberty. It is important, therefore, that that liberty should not be abused; and this House ought not to permit any of its members to take the time of the House to abuse his privilege by saying anything derogatory to the character of any man unless it is a matter that is properly before the House for consideration. That is why I made the point of order; not on account of anything personal toward the gentleman from Kentucky. I have the highest regard for him, but I did it for the dignity of the House and the dignity of the country.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken, and would be very glad to have the judgment of the House taken upon it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I am very glad the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] has made that remark, which enables me to say in reply that there could not have been a greater misapprehension of my position in this case than to suppose that this prosecution grew out of any personal ill-will on my part or any injury ever done to me personally. Why, sir, if I had my papers here from home I could show when I was first elected to Congress in 1874 I received most complimentary letters from these men, Murray and Wharton. I do not remember to have ever seen either of them until after the investigation of their conduct had been determined upon by the Department of Justice in 1876.

But I feel it to be my duty to lay before that Department the complaints that were constantly coming to me of the unwarranted arrests of men. I will give an illustration, which is but a sample of what was going on. The Speaker is very much mistaken if he thinks there is no relevancy between my conclusion and the provisions contained in this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that he has not decided that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] may not with perfect propriety under the rules of the House show any injustice that has been committed heretofore under the old law; and he may attribute that of course to the fact that the limitation was five years, or to any other cause he may choose. All the Chair decided was that in the discussion of this bill it was not in order to assail the character of a gentleman or to enter into a personal explanation upon the part of the gentleman from Kentucky about other matters not connected with this bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. But when this House appoints a committee to investigate the expenditures in the Department of Justice, and I, as a Representative on this floor, speak a word of encouragement for that committee in the prosecution of its work, and was then called before them to tell of what I had been informed, and gave the names of competent witnesses, the committee turns around and takes what the criminal, under grave charges, tells them he knows about it. Then the Associated Press sends his statement all over the country, while the chairman of the committee holds what I have said in the strictest confidence, for reasons satisfactory to the committee. The Speaker of this House was called before that committee to testify as to that man's general character.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of order. I ask the Speaker to enforce the rules of this House.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. And I shall insist upon its being done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky must either proceed in order or take his seat.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I submit the question to the House whether I am to be treated in this way by a star-chamber committee of the House, without being allowed to speak when the matter comes before the House on a question as directly connected with the subject as this is. If the House shall decide against me, then I shall take my seat. But if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] is to interrupt me every time I fail to speak words to suit his delicate taste, then I must ask the House to decide between us which is right.

I do not wish to abuse the privileges of the House. But I feel that the bill before the House is an important matter, and what I am saying bears directly upon it. As the committee having the man under charges to testify in his own behalf, and then calling the Speaker of this House and a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States to say that they know that this man stands as high as anybody, the implication is that I have done something wrong, and I think I ought to be allowed to show to the House that this is an important matter, which the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice should investigate. I have been trying to have this justice done for eight years.

Mr. VANCE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VANCE. Is not the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] entitled to the floor for a personal explanation? If he has been assailed as a member of this House, I think he ought to have the right to be heard, and I suggest to him to take the floor for a personal explanation, and not upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated distinctly that the gentleman had the right, if his character as a Representative had been assailed, or if he conceives that it has been assailed, to rise on the floor under the rules of the House and make a personal explanation; or he would have the right to discuss the proceedings of the committee to which he has referred, or the character of the witnesses that have appeared before it, when the report of that committee should come before the House. But when the point of order was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] that the remarks made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] were not relevant to the bill now under consideration, the Chair decided that they were not. That is all the Chair has deceided.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Vermont near me [Mr. STEWART] says that the committee did not call Mr. Murray at all; that he came of his own will. I do not know that that helps the case any; I leave it to the good judgment of the House whether that committee is performing its duty fairly and squarely.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed in order under the rules of the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask the Clerk to read the bill before the House, and then I appeal to the good judgment of the House to determine whether I have not been in order all the time. I ask the Clerk to read the bill in my own time.

Mr. BEACH. I object to the reading of the bill again.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman ought to know enough to know that he can not do that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to have the bill read in his own time.

The Clerk again read the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Now, to show you the necessity for restricting the power of the district attorney and the marshal in these cases, I refer you to the testimony of G. K. Chase before the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, and which I incorporate in my remarks:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did Murray, in your presence, deny specifically the statements that were made with regard to those constructive fees?

A. No, sir; he admitted some of them and amended one, the McCord warrant.

Q. What did he say in regard to that?

A. He admitted that Diven's statement was true, and amended his charge against the Government in that case accordingly. I had the original McCord warrant with these papers, and there was another paper with the newspaper charges, which I do not see here.

Q. The statement in regard to McCord is this: "In December, 1875, Mat. McCord was brought to this city (Louisville) from Livermore, charged with having deposited in the post-office, for the purpose of being carried by mail, certain circulars, concerning illegal lotteries. In relation to that case I would state that the prisoner McCord, was brought here by a private citizen from Livermore without any warrant and without the marshal's knowledge. The marshal charged for going for him and bringing him with a guard. The marshal himself returns on the back of the warrant fees to the amount of $82.60." Did you call Marshal Murray's attention to that statement?

A. I did. I showed him the original warrant in his own handwriting all the way through, and he admitted that there was no guard, but he said that was the only way he could pay Hackett, who brought the prisoner down.

The point to which I desire to call your attention just here is that constructive fees were charged. They would arrest a man in Louisville and charge mileage from the man's home, distant perhaps two hundred miles. They would charge for traveling expenses, meals, guards, &c. They would charge constructive fees for all items which would have been allowed if the man had been arrested at his home and brought to Louisville. In one case in Letcher County, nearly three hundred miles from Louisville, they arrested a man named Adams. The warrant was issued in Louisville; and because the warrant was issued there, it was decided that the man must be brought to Louisville for preliminary trial, although he was taken past a United States court at London, Ky., and I believe put in jail there, one hundred and sixty miles from Louisville. The man actually arrested was the brother of the man who should have been arrested. He wanted to identify himself when arrested; but instead of being allowed to do so at the place where he was arrested, he was taken to Louisville, and all the fees connected with taking him there were doubtless charged. Of course, when he identified himself in Louisville as not being the man called for in the warrant, he was allowed to go home, being obliged of course to pay his own expenses. Such an outrage on the rights of American citizenship ought not to be tolerated, and was not often attempted upon any but the poorest and most illiterate citizens as well as most remote from the city of Louisville.

A few years ago in the county of Whitley about forty-five men were arrested on charges which in some cases were five years old. Many of those men were entirely innocent and were so declared when they got to Louisville, but they were taken about two hundred miles from their homes (passing by the nearest commissioner) to the city of Louisville, one hundred and sixty miles beyond, to have their preliminary trials. After all the fees possible had been made by the arrest of these poor people District Attorney Wharton recommended that the cases be dismissed and they were dismissed.

This bill is intended to provide that these prosecutions for technical violations of the law upon charges which are four or five years old shall not be allowed—shall not be made the means of fleecing the Government in order that marshals and district attorneys may make fees. We ought to go further and abolish the fee system.

Such enormities as these can not be defended by any Republican. When Republicans are guilty of such offenses the proper thing for us to do, if we would stand squarely before the country, is to ferret out the crime, uncover the scandals, and turn the guilty parties out of office. This bill will do much toward preventing the temptation for the commission of such offenses.

I will not occupy the time of the House further; but I ask to be allowed in my printed remarks to make more copious extracts than I have been able to do, and with that permission I will yield the floor.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I shall object to anything being printed except what would be directly in order on this bill, unless the gentleman has actually said it. I have no objection to the printing of anything that would be strictly in order on this bill; but anything outside of that, anything that would be personal, that would attack any person, either private citizen or public official, I shall object to.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it is not my intention to print anything except what I have already said or quotations from the testimony before the Springer committee.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman will be allowed to print under the conditions stated by him. The Chair hears no objection.

APPENDIX.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 29, 1884.

RALPH BALLIN recalled.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State whether there have been on file in the Department of Justice any papers or reports in reference to the accounts of United States marshal for the State of Kentucky during the time that Mr. Murray held that office?

A. Yes.

Q. State where those papers are at this time?

A. They are in the committee-room; at least they were yesterday evening.

Q. State whether this package [handing papers to the witness] is the package of papers sent by the Attorney-General to this committee in relation to the matter spoken of?

A. I recognize this as the package.

Q. Have you examined these papers yourself to see what are their contents?

A. I did give them a casual examination.

Q. State briefly the result of that casual examination?

A. I looked over these papers, and I can only state to the committee what suggested itself to me in that casual examination. I have no proof for it.

The CHAIRMAN. You are not called upon for proofs of the truth of what you may have observed in these papers. To what do they relate?

A. They are vouchers for fees, which vouchers accompanied the accounts of the late Marshal Murray, and for which he claimed credit in his accounts. There is also a duplicate of an emolument return rendered by him to the Department for the second half of the calendar year 1875.

Q. From your knowledge of the papers which should have been sent to the Department of Justice, or retained in the offices of the United States marshal, what do you say as to whether these represent the whole of the papers that ought to be found in relation to these accounts, or whether they are merely a partial list?

A. These papers are merely parts of the account; little bits of it.

Q. Are these all the papers that have been sent to the Department of Justice in reference to that half-yearly account?

A. I can not say that, because these papers must have been referred to the Department of Justice long before I was appointed in that Department. I merely know that these papers came from the Department of Justice from the fact that they were sent to me while I was testifying here the other day, with the instructions that I was to hand them to the committee; and I find on some of the papers the stamp of the Department. Consequently I know that they came from the Department.

The CHAIRMAN. A letter was sent to the Attorney-General requesting all papers in reference to Marshal Murray to be sent to the committee, and these papers were sent in response to that letter.

The WITNESS. I have no doubt that these are all of his papers that are in the Department of Justice.

Q. The other papers relating to his accounts would be, I suppose, in the Treasury Department, and also in the marshal's office in Louisville, Ky.

A. It is questionable whether his duplicate emolument returns are on file in the court at Louisville, but the clerk of the court is, under the law, required to retain on file the duplicates of accounts approved by the court, the originals of which are sent to the Treasury Department for payment.

Q. What part of the probable term of service of Marshal Murray is embraced in these papers?

A. I did not examine the dates very closely, and can not tell. They are just snatches of fee accounts. These papers would probably not constitute one-tenth of the fee account rendered by the marshal for one year. They are but small samples.

Q. They are but fragments of such papers as ought to be found in the Treasury Department and in the office of the court at Louisville?

A. Yes.

Q. State the names of the deputy marshals whose accounts are covered by these papers.

A. John Wyatt, H. Diven, Howard, and others.

Q. State whether the papers before you show any investigation into the accounts of Marshal Murray by Mr. George K. Chase, a former agent of the Department of Justice.

A. There are marginal notes on some of the vouchers, which I believe to be in the handwriting of Mr. Chase, and which would indicate that he had investigated them.

Q. State whether you have examined among these papers what purports to be a statement made by Deputy Marshal H. Diven.

A. I have.

Q. State whether that statement is accompanied by any indorsement by Mr. Chase.

A. There is an indorsement of Mr. Chase's on it.

Q. Is that in Mr. Chase's handwriting?

A. Yes.

Q. Are you familiar with his handwriting?

A. I am familiar with his signature, and it appears to me as if all this indorsement was in the same handwriting. I have no doubt that it is Mr. Chase's handwriting.

Q. Read that indorsement on Diven's statement in the handwriting of Mr. Chase.

A. [Reading]:

The within statement is made by Mr. Henry Diven, of Louisville, Ky., formerly deputy United States marshal for nine years last past, who resigned on January 4, 1876. I find Diven's character for veracity beyond question. I have investigated the within statements, as made by him, and find them substantially true.

G. K. CHASE,
Agent Department of Justice.

AUGUST 8, 1876.

The CHAIRMAN. Read the statement submitted by Diven, and to which that indorsement is appended.

The witness read as follows:

"AUGUST 1, 1876.

"I, H. Diven, state as follows:

"In December, 1875, Mat. McCord was brought to this city from Livermore, charged with having deposited in the post-office, for the purpose of being carried by mail, certain circulars concerning illegal lotteries. In relation to that case, I would state that the prisoner, McCord, was brought here by a private citizen from Livermore, without any warrant, and without the marshal's knowledge. The marshal charged for going after him and bringing him with a guard. The marshal made his return on the back of the warrant, charging fees to the amount of $82.60.

"In January, 1873, the judge of the Lexington election refused to receive the votes of negroes who had not paid their poll-taxes. General James F. Robinson, Dr. Chipley, J. W. Cochran, John C. Young, Matthew Foursbee, John Marrs, George Snyder, Reese, and others were arrested by M. F. Atley, a deputy marshal, and all came down together to Louisville, without any guards. The marshal charged for guards with most of them.

"In attending on the commissioner the marshal is allowed to have one man to attend on each case. In many cases there would be no one there in reality, but fictitious names would be put on the roll. They would put 'Diven' down, for instance, when he would not be there at all, and then afterwards cross the name and substitute Sam. Crail, or put some fictitious name.

"The deputy marshal is allowed to make $3,000 a year, which would be $1,500 for six months. When they came to make up the fee-bill for the six months, if it is found that the deputy has made $2,000, for instance, for the six months instead of $1,500, the extra $500 is transferred nominally to the account of some deputy who has not made up to the allowance. That deputy never gets the extra amount allowed him, as shown by the rolls. The emolument return ought to show exactly what the deputy makes for each six months; but the deputy has been required to sign the emolument returns in blank. All through Kentucky we have United States commissioners, but when a man is arrested, say in the mountains, instead of taking him to the nearest commissioner, where he could get his witnesses and stand a chance to give bail, he is brought to Louisville, in order to make fees, and in eight cases out of ten guards are charged for when they really don't have any guards. The man is allowed to lay in jail without being able to get his witnesses, when at the place where he was arrested, if brought before the nearest commissioner, he could obtain his witnesses or give bail.

"I will state that when John R. Reno was United States collector in one of the Kentucky districts he came up here to attend a meeting of the Grand Army of the Republic, and he was paid on the witness-rolls about $100, when he was not a witness in any case.

"James H. Ashcroft, while he was deputy United States marshal and deputy collector at Paducah, Ky. (two offices under Government, which he had no right to hold at the same time), came to Louisville on a visit, and he was paid on the witness-roll $38 as a witness, when he was not a witness in any case.

"There is a negro named James H. Moody who is paid as janitor for cleaning the third floor $2 per day. He is paid $2 for every day the court is open in the year. When the regular court opens, twice a year, in order to manage so as to give him $4 a day he has been put down as one of the bailiffs of the court and he is allowed $2 per day extra for that. In the October term, 1875, the controller discovered that he had been signing twice, and disallowed that term, so, to accomplish the same end, General Murray put another negro, Taylor, down on the roll as bailiff instead of Moody, but did not tell the negro Taylor anything about it. Moody now pays Taylor $2 per week for cleaning up, and when court is over Mr. Farleigh gets the old negro Taylor to sign the certificate and hands Moody the money. So, as it is now managed, Moody's name does not appear twice in Washington, while he still gets the money.

"In many cases, especially bankrupt cases, where it becomes necessary to serve day process outside of a warrant upon a party at some distance in the interior from Louisville, it has been the custom of the marshal to send the original process to the postmaster at the place, or some constable, or sheriff, or some other person, with directions to execute the same and return the original to him by mail. When the process is returned executed, the marshal charges fees the same as though a deputy had actually been sent, thus charging fees for something which has not been done.

"The deputy marshals are allowed three-quarters of the fees which they make, paying their own expenses. This arrangement is made by General Murray, and the remaining one-quarter of the fees goes to him. In cases where the deputy marshal returns without making an arrest, the whole expense falls upon the deputy, and furnishes a motive for charging extra and illegal fees, where it can be done, upon some subsequent trip, in order to get even.

"A great many people in town that do not go to the collector's office and pay heir special tax I would go around and hunt them up, and take them before the commissioner, and after he disposed of the case, if I would make a return on a warrant, General Murray would sign it, and he would pay me the witness fees.

"Then I would go to these men's places on the corner, and look in and see that he did not have his special tax put up in some conspicuous place, and I would ask him, 'Mr. Brown, you have not got your Government license?' 'Yes,' he would say, 'I have got them.' 'Where are they?' 'I have got them in the drawer.' Then I would say to him, 'You have been reported to the United States commissioner for not having it.' In point of fact he had not been reported, but General Murray did not understand this arrangement. I would set a time and he would go up there. Between the time that I had seen him and the time that he came to the commissioner I would write out a warrant in my own handwriting; no affidavit, though. I would write the warrant, and the commissioner would sign it; but it would have no affidavit. The commissioner would ask if I had inquired into the case. In eight cases out of ten the man would tell him that when he got his license he didn't read the penalty. Most of them were Germans, and he would consider the matter a minute or so, and say, 'Don't let this occur again. Go and put them up.' He would not make any charge against them for that as commissioner, but the commissioner would charge the United States. The fees for this kind of business were about $20, marshal and all. The marshal got about $8, the district attorney $5. The district attorney would not be present. The marshal's costs would be about $5.50, on the average, and witness fees $3, putting this negro Taylor in with me.

"This arrangement the marshal understood, because he paid me 50 cents extra to send the negro in to catch him. I could not get into his grocery to catch him; they would know me. I would send the negro in, as if he was buying potatoes, &c., and I would go in in five minutes afterward, and send the fellow up. When I got fees on these town warrants I did not resort to anything of the kind about the negro—very seldom sent anybody in. When I executed the warrants myself the arrangement was that he would pay me $1.50 witness fees, and 50 cents extra in case I was out anything, or sending the negro in. Then I had to keep the negro all the time. This arrangement has been going on for some two years. He figured it up that the court would be open about two hundred days in the year, and I would be allowed $2 a day as crier, and I would make $2 a day on the warrants. He figured it up at one every day. He put some of his relations in—young Crittenden—and forced me down. He took all the work away from me and gave it to Crittenden. He told the clerks to bring the process to the office, and Mr. Farleigh would hand him the process.

"Another point: If they argue the reason that these men are brought from a great distance is because there is no district attorney to prosecute the case, he don't know his cases until he looks at his fee-bills. He never sees one case in five hundred. He never looks at his cases until he looks at his fee-bills, and somebody makes them out for him.

"Most of these men brought down from the country are brought down by men deputized by deputies. General Murray can not delegate his power and authority. John Wyatt knows that he has not made out a legal return on a process for three years—all legal charges. He is allowed $2 per day every day he is after a man, and he charges for days he is in town before he starts. If he is here three or four days he charges for them.

"He don't take guards from Louisville. He may go way up in the country and hire men from there; but he don't take them from here. General Murray would have discharged him six months ago if he was not afraid that he would talk. He is drunk all the time. Colonel Bullitt told me himself that it would never do to let John Wyatt out of the office; that he would go out on the street and talk.

"You have not put down about Charley Ballard. They took him down to Paducah, and they put him on the witness-roll. They took J. Fry Lawrence down into the country and put him on the witness-roll several years. I spoke to Colonel Wharton about it, and made him stop it; and he did not go this time. He did not take him down this time; he had been summoned, though.

"John Wyatt brought a man down in February, and charged two guards. Sam Crail was astonished, and asked if he could not give bail up there. He could not give any kind of bail. I think his name was Thomas Scalf. He told Sam Crail that he had two guards.

"Since the 1st of January, 1876, while Mr. Merriweather was commissioner, there was but one commissioner here, and that was him. He was commissioner before the 1st of January. He done all the business, civil and criminal. He resigned the clerk's business. After that Judge Ballard appointed John Wharton, a brother of Colonel Wharton. He appointed Sam Crail and Austin Ballard, his son. That is three. The old nigger would go out and get cases, and take one case before one commissioner in the morning, and one case before another commissioner in the evening, and get two witness fees. That has only been since the 1st of January. Wharton tried to get me appointed in the Secret Service, but Bluford Wilson went back on him.

"If a commissioner tries fifty cases, he don't get but one per diem, but three commissioners will get three per diems. Previous to January Mr. Merriweather has done all the work himself for four or five years. I took all the town cases to him, and never issued an affidavit either.

"As to General Murray not knowing anything about these things, General Murray sat down and made out the warrant. I walked out in the hall and said: 'General Murray, do you want this warrant?' He said 'Yes.' I never would have said a word about it, only I went to Colonel Bullitt to stop the illegal fees, for he knew that I wanted to get out of the office. I didn't want him to tell Murray who his authority was. I wanted to tell him that he had read that warrant on the desk, and he had tried the man, and that it was not right; but he didn't do it that way, but told him that I told him. I was going for him all the time. Farleigh is as big a rascal as he is.

"The mayor's election came off the 7th of December. John Wyatt charges for fourteen days' endeavoring to arrest a man. He commences charging the 6th, 7th, and on up to the 14th, when he was in town the 6th or 7th, and I would swear to it. You ask him if he did not vote for mayor last December. He can not get out of that. General Murray knows that a man can not do anything by paying his own expenses. Wyatt went out a few days ago and did not catch anybody, and when he goes out another time he is bound to get even. If the thing can be sifted to the bottom about one-half of his fees will be found to be illegal.

"The first I knew of his trying to get illegal fees was very soon after he was appointed. He called a witness out in the hall and asked where he lived, and he told him in one of the lower counties, and he charged mileage for going after him, and the clerk up there told him he could not do that; 'You can't charge mileage, for you didn't go after him.' Crail knows all about that. You had better ask him. I took a prisoner to Galveston in December, 1875, and charged for two guards for taking him there. I had the clerk of the Saint Cloud Hotel as a witness, and Mr. Brown was a witness. I charged for two guards. I paid Mr. Brown's expenses and hotel bill when he was there. General Murray knew that there was no guards. He knew that I had these two men as witnesses. He got his one-fourth. Farleigh is at the bottom of it; he makes out all the warrants.

"In the McCord case he paid Hacket 10 cents a mile for 180 miles, and $1.50 a day for one day, $19.50. This last was as witness fee. Then he paid him $25 for his services and expenses in arresting the man. Then General Murray made the return himself, pretending to adopt the act of W. C. Hackett as his own. I think they call it 180 miles to Lawrence. It is 21 miles back of Owensborough. General Murray told Hackett to make out his expenses. I heard him. He sat down and wrote on a slip of paper the expenses bringing prisoner McCord to Louisville. 'Expenses from Livermore to Owensborough, 85 cents; hotel bill at Owensborough, $1; steamboat from Owensborough to Louisville, $4.' He handed it to the general, and he says, 'For two of you?' That is the last I seen of it until I seen the return on the warrant. He called him in his private office."

Q. Was McCord discharged on the examination?

A. No, sir; he was held over. I don't want to say anything against Colonel Bullitt. The charge was that he had deposited these things in Kentucky, and he had not. When the case was brought before the grand jury, he was discharged. His brother is postmaster over here, and you can get him any time you want him.

"Peter Johnson is a fictitious name. See McCord about Reno and Ashcroft.

"I am afraid that they won't tell you everything. Crail has got some money and property, but he has a lifetime place as long as he suits Judge Ballard. He can give you some points, though. He is not married. He is a clever fellow.

"Colonel Wharton said to Sam Crail, 'Sam, are my accounts all straight?' He says, 'Yes; why do you ask me?' Colonel Wharton says, 'How are Murray's accounts?' Wharton says, 'They are all wrong.' Wharton says, 'You surprise me, Sam.' Sam says, 'No, I don't surprise you a damned bit.'"

The CHAIRMAN. Does this statement embrace substantially the contents of all the papers that have been sent to the committee?

The WITNESS. I looked over them last evening as you directed me to do, and I did not see this statement at all. It was not among the other papers. Perhaps it was on the table. You asked me to look through the vouchers, and I did so, without seeing this statement. On just looking over the vouchers the following suggestions occurred to me that I would act upon, at least so far as suspension of the accounts would go, if I were in the Treasury and adjusting these accounts. "John Wyatt's accounts, expenses in endeavoring to arrest, seem excessive. Mileage appears excessive." I made a note bearing on the duplicate emolument return. "Emolument return for second half of 1875 embraces credit claimed for $680, voucher 9, alleged stationery bill from Bradley & Gilbert." That seems to me an unusual charge for stationery in a marshal's office for six months. Probably the bill itself would show what it was for.

The CHAIRMAN. Is not $1,500 about the amount paid for stationery for all the Department of Justice in this city?

The WITNESS. I do not know. I know that the amount is very small.

The CHAIRMAN. I am informed by a gentleman connected with the Department that the whole amount allowed for stationery for the Department of Justice in this city is only about $1,500.

The WITNESS. I also made the following note: "Deputies apparently charged separate trips for each prisoner transported, when perhaps several prisoners were transported together. The charge for guards in each voucher seems subject to investigation, as it stands to reason that guards were not needed in every case. The travel charged seems unusually heavy, and is perhaps excessive." I also made the following memorandum: "The deputy marshals sued out warrants of arrest. Many cases dismissed; perhaps the majority of them. Deputies seemed to have taken prisoners for whose arrest they had more than one warrant before several commissioners on the same day. The only object could have been to make fees for commissioners and marshals."

The CHAIRMAN. Explain that process a little more clearly.

The WITNESS. For instance, where a deputy has three warrants to serve in one day, and there are three commissioners in town, if he takes his three prisoners before the one commissioner the commissioner gets only one per diem. The commissioner's fee for hearing and deciding criminal cases is $5 a day for each day necessarily attending; the deputy marshal's fees $2 a day for each day attending on a commissioner's court; that fee is for attending court and for bringing in and guarding prisoners and witnesses. Now, if a deputy marshal has three prisoners and he takes them before one commissioner, that commissioner gets only $5 and the deputy marshal only $2; but if he takes one prisoner before one commissioner he charges his $2 a day, and the commissioner charges $5 a day; then the deputy marshal takes the second prisoner before a second commissioner and repeats the charges, and so with the third prisoner and the third commissioner. In that way often fictitious names are inserted in accounts, and the accounting officers of the Treasury are deceived.

I also made a note in reference to the McCord case, as follows: "United States vs. Mat. McCord, post-office case, costs $26.60. No name is given of officer making arrest and transporting prisoner. Perhaps William Hackett, who appears as a witness summoned to testify in the case, was the party making the service if at all."

I see from the statement of Mr. Diven that Mr. Hackett did transport himself. It also appears that actual expenses are charged at different dates and on different suits, while probably the papers in the hands of the marshal were served on one and the same trip. I also find little slips pinned to the vouchers which show that attendances on the commissioner's court are charged for persons who did not attend.

The CHAIRMAN. In whose handwriting are these slips?

The WITNESS. Mr. Chase's; those making charges on dates wherein the deputy who really attended has charged his per diem for attendance, and where another name was probably inserted to deceive the accounting officer, I also made this note: "Deputy marshal's receipts to marshal's emolument returns were, judging from the different inks used, signed by them in blank."

The CHAIRMAN. That is a custom which was frequently found in deputy-marshal's accounts?

The WITNESS. Yes. I also made the following memorandum: "E. H. Murray's personal fee account shows fictitious charges for attendances of deputies on commissioner's courts in cases wherein warrants were served by the marshal in person."

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by fictitious charges?

The WITNESS. I mean the names of men being put in as attending commissioner's court when they did not attend. I also found that from the slips.

The CHAIRMAN. As the result of Mr. Chase's investigation?

The WITNESS. Yes. I also made this note: "It also appears that deputy United States marshals assumed authority to deputize persons to serve process for them (the deputies). Deputy marshals can not legally do that, and it is a dangerous thing to allow a man who is not commissioned, has given no bond, and has not taken an oath of office, to arrest, transport, or commit to jail any person charged with a violation of United States laws." These are the notes that I made in running over these papers. I do not know but that the Treasury Department may have suspended parts of these accounts.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You do not know whether these accounts have been finally settled or not?

A. I do not. The statement of disallowances on Mr. Murray's account will show it.

Q. That will appear by calling on the Treasury Department for a statement of the accounts of Mr. Murray as settled?

A. Yes. You will see from the statement of disallowances what disallowances were made, and for what reasons.

Q. From your knowledge and experience in the investigation of accounts of court officials, and from the casual examination of the papers before you, what would you say as to the necessity of having a careful examination made into the accounts of these officers in Kentucky?

A. I suppose that Mr. Chase would be a better judge of that than I am. He has been on the spot and knows how far he has gone. I do not know what ground he covered in his investigation; his report does not indicate it. For instance, I do not see anything in the papers as to the report of Mr. Chase on this charge of $680, stationery, in the emolument return. This is a matter which came directly under the marshal's observation, and for which no deputy is responsible. The other matters might, perhaps, be traced to the deputies. This charge may be right; he may have paid that much money for stationery, or it may have been a clerical error in using the word stationery instead of some other word showing the purpose for which he may have paid out this money.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. From the papers that have been given to you for inspection, and from the report of Mr. Chase, the examining agent of a former Attorney-General, what do you say as to whether or not there is a disclosure of irregularities in the office of marshal in the State of Kentucky?

A. Undoubtedly.

Q. Is that report, and are the papers submitted in connection with it, of such a character that this committee would be justified, or that you as an examiner would be justified, in recommending a reformatory line of action, or would a further and more specific examination of the fees be required?

A. I suppose that the points raised by Mr. Chase and the statements of Mr. Diven show what really has been done there. I have no doubt that the statement of Mr. Diven shows the real state of affairs as they then existed, because Kentucky was not the only State where such things occurred. They had been found in other districts.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What is your opinion as to the necessity of making a more careful examination into the affairs of that office?

A. The necessity would depend upon the objects of the investigation.

Q. With the same objects in view that you have had in the investigations which you have made into other offices?

A. The investigations made heretofore were made with a view of recovering the money.

Q. Could not the money be recovered in this case if it was found that it was drawn out improperly?

A. If the Treasury Department has not acted on this report of Mr. Chase's, and has not suspended the marshal's accounts, it may be that an examination made on the spot, even at this late day, would result in recovering money for the Government.

Q. If fictitious and fraudulent accounts have been allowed by the Treasury Department, can not the money be recovered?

A. Yes; it is possible that the Treasury Department may have suspended payment on these accounts at the time that Mr. Chase made his report. If that has not been done, I have no doubt that the money can be recovered for the Government paid out on fictitious charges made and presented by the late marshal.

Q. You mean even if they have been allowed and paid?

A. Even if they have been allowed already they would be recharged to him, and recovered on his official bond.

Q. Then it is your opinion that where accounts have been allowed by the Treasury Department of such a character as indicated by these papers the amount can be recovered by the institution of suits against the marshal and his bondsmen?

A. Yes; if the proof is conclusive that the Government has paid out moneys it did not owe they can be recovered on the marshal's official bond by reopening the account and recharging the marshal with them.

Q. Assuming that such proceedings would be instituted, what would you say as to the necessity (having in view the economy of the service) of further inquiry into these accounts?

A. The view of which you speak is that this proceeding be instituted by suit?

Q. Yes, by suit or otherwise.

A. If with a view to proceed by a suit, an examination might be necessary; but whether it affects the economy of the service I can not state, because these abuses may not to-day exist in Kentucky.

Q. You know that they did exist at other places at that time?

A. I know that they have existed in districts which I have investigated.

Q. Up to the time of your recent investigations?

A. Yes.

Q. Do not these papers disclose only a very partial amount of the business which must have been transacted in that office during the term of Marshal Murray?

A. These papers show a very little part of it.

Q. If the office were managed during his incumbency of it in the same way as these papers disclose for the short time that they did cover, would it not be well to have an examination made of the whole of his official term?

A. As I said before, if it is to recover money, an examination may be necessary so as to secure the proofs of fraud or of fictitious accounts.

Q. Or of excessive charges?

A. The only difficulty will be that as the charges are very old it will be difficult to find proof of them. The witnesses may not be living, or it might be difficult to find them.

Q. That would be determined upon inquiry?

A. Yes.

Q. How much time would it require for one of the agents of the Department to make what would be regarded as a proper investigation into the affairs of this office for a period of four years?

A. To go through the fee account for four years properly, taking each year as requiring two months, would make eight months; I mean to go through them and to probe them. In making our investigations we have usually examined only one year. The Fitzsimmons accounts covered but one year. I only took the unadjusted accounts, and they showed false statements to the amount of $7,000 in one year. That examination, which also included his emolument return, took me three months, and the Longstreet investigation occupied three officers two months. There is a good deal of time lost in traveling and hunting up witnesses. Take, for instance, a case against John Smith. The marshal's account may show that he arrested John Smith at a certain place and transported him to a certain place. In order to test that item the agent has to find John Smith, and has also to find the man charged as a guard; and finally he has to get hold of the deputy-marshal and make him own up that he has rendered a false account.

Q. Then you take a year, or a portion of a year, and make a thorough examination as to that time, and make an average as to the rest?

A. I never did that with the marshal's accounts. I have never averaged them. I did that once with Mr. Wolfley, clerk of the court in New Orleans.

Q. Then you did not come to a conclusion as to the Fitzsimmons accounts?

A. I disallowed about $7,000 on his unadjusted fee accounts for one year. I found from his books that he had kept from his deputies moneys due to them for fees earned, and for which accounts had been presented to the Treasury and allowed to the amount of $11,800. Against that $11,800 there was, I think, $3,500 in the Treasury to Fitzsimmons's credit. That was $11,800 and $7,000, making $18,000, besides $5,000 or $6,000 emolument returns. He had given false receipts claiming credits for money which he had not paid out. In that way I got at the twenty-odd thousand dollars which I spoke of the other day, and which my report shows. The marshal's earnings from civil cases were not touched at all, because that would have been an endless job.

Q. Have you any other statement to make in relation to your examination of the papers before you?

Q. No, sir; I have said about all that occurred to me, and these are only surmises from the face of the papers.

Adjourned until to-morrow.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 30, 1884.

JOHN D. WHITE, a Representative from the State of Kentucky, appeared before the committee, and was examined as follows:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What district of Kentucky do you represent in this Congress?

A. I represent the tenth district now. It is a part of the district which I represented in the Forty-fourth Congress.

Q. How long have you served in Congress?

A. This is my third term. In my other terms I represented the ninth district.

Q. In what part of the State of Kentucky is that district located?

A. In the southeastern portion of the State.

Q. Is it remote from Louisville?

A. Rather. In the Forty-fourth Congress I had twenty-three counties in my district, I believe, beginning with Montgomery, which is about twenty-five miles (the nearest line of it) from Lexington, Montgomery being a blue-grass county. The rest of the counties in my district were mountainous. At present I represent that blue-grass county and Clark County, which was added the year before last from Mr. BLACKBURN'S district; and five of the mountainous counties were cut off, four of them being attached to Mr. THOMPSON'S district and one to Mr. WOLFORD'S district.

Q. Since you have been a Representative in Congress have you been informed of the existence of any abuses or irregularities in the administration of the office of United States marshal and of United States deputy marshals?

A. When I was first elected to Congress I was a mere boy; I had never held any public office before, and was not acquainted with the manner of conducting public business. I knew scarcely any one in Washington. But very soon I began to get letters complaining of the conduct of deputy marshals as they were executing the law in my district.

Q. In what year was that?

A. That was in 1875, I think. These complaints were so numerous, and the offenses seemed to be of such a petty character, but so frequent, that I concluded to take the matter to some of my friends. I do not know but that I went to the President with it first (not knowing that I ought to have gone to the Department of Justice), and told him of the arrests that had been made for such little offenses as, for instance, selling a few pounds of tobacco which a man had raised on his own farm. They would arrest that man in Pike county, as far as they could get from Louisville, and take him to Louisville, stopping on the way and putting him overnight in jail. And that, too, was being done by such drunken deputies as one man of the name of Wyatt, who figured conspicuously in that section of the country. I recommended a general pardon for such petty offenses where, for instance, a man had been arrested on a warrant for an offense that was two or three years old, such as selling a pint of whisky, or a few pounds of tobacco, or small offenses of that character. I thought that if a general pardon could be granted and a new order of things started in Kentucky it would give satisfaction to the people at large. I said that these men were being harassed in a way that was liable to lead to a serious trouble. The President very politely suggested that I should get the names of the parties, and he referred me to the Attorney-General. The Attorney-General heard me patiently, and referred me to the district attorney of Kentucky, who was at that time Mr. Wharton. I had never met Mr. Wharton, but he had written me such a flattering letter when I was elected to Congress that I presumed, perhaps, a little on his anxiety, as well as my own to allay any trouble that might be brewing in Kentucky from these annoyances. So I unbosomed myself to him. I told him that I would like to know the names and residences and offenses of persons charged with these petty offenses, and that I was seeking a general amnesty for them. I said I hoped that he would furnish that information, and, if he could do so consistently, recommend such amnesty. I never received any reply to that letter. The thing went on for some time. These letters still came in to me from different parts of my district. For instance, I remember a case of this kind: A man named Adams, living in Letcher County (at the farthest part of it almost from Louisville), was arrested on a warrant in which he was not named at all, but which contained his brother's name. He protested that he was not the person named in the warrant, and that he could identify himself by his neighbors, but he was not allowed to do so. He was taken all the way from his home to the city of Louisville, and, of course, as soon as he identified himself there he was dismissed and allowed to go home at his own expense. I suppose that if you were to look through the accounts of the marshal you would find that the fees were charged for that arrest. A case of that kind was considered a very annoying thing for a Federal official to permit, and of course I had to complain about it. At that time I had never met Mr. Murray nor Mr. Wharton. I did complain to the Attorney-General, and asked for an investigation of that whole matter.

Q. Have you a copy of the letter which you sent to the Attorney-General?

A. I do not know that I have; but I suppose it is on file in the Department of Justice. I am quite sure that I wrote to the Attorney-General; or, if not, I talked to him very freely, urging an investigation of this whole business, and saying that doubtless there was something wrong down there. I did not know who was responsible, but I knew that there was something wrong when men could be arrested in Letcher County and taken to Louisville, a distance of over two hundred miles, going right past the office of a commissioner, for there was a commissioner at that time at London, which is about one hundred and fifty miles from Louisville.

Q. And within fifty miles of the place of arrest?

A. It must be two hundred and fifty miles from Louisville to where that man was arrested in Letcher County. He would have to ride on horseback from Letcher County through London, as a rule, in order to get to Louisville. Of course one could go around London, but the ordinary course of travel would be through London. There was a United States commissioner there at that time. The deputies would not stop there to have the preliminary examination of a man, but would take him to Louisville to have him examined there. The commissioner at London could have bound the man over, or, if he were found not guilty, could have discharged him and let the man go back home. The man himself would have the benefit of being able to have his witnesses there and of being able to give bond. Of course the farther these deputy marshals got a poor fellow away from home the worse off he was in the way of procuring witnesses or giving bond. The same thing happened if a man was arrested in Floyd County, or Pike County, or Magoffin County. The marshals would take him through Mount Sterling, where there was a commissioner, and would bring him to Louisville, which is perhaps one hundred and twenty-five miles beyond Mount Sterling, and would charge mileage for themselves and guards and prisoner. It seemed to me (and it was so presented to me) that the object was to run up costs. I complained, as I thought, to the fountain-head when I went to the President. He referred me, as I say, to the Attorney-General, and the Attorney-General referred me to Mr. Wharton to get a list of the names and residences and offenses of persons charged with these petty violations of law. But nothing was done. At the national convention which met at Cincinnati in 1876 (when Mr. Hayes was nominated for the Presidency) I was introduced to Mr. Murray, and I think to Mr. Wharton, for the first time. Mr. Murray complained to me particularly about this investigation, saying that it was calculated to do him harm.

Q. What investigation; one which the Attorney-General had instituted in his office?

A. No; the one that I had asked for. He led me to believe that there was nothing in the matter. But the continued complaints that I received, and the fact that I had already asked an investigation, led me to stand my ground. I told him I had nothing against him personally, but that there was something going wrong through his deputies in my district unquestionably, and that I could not ask to have the investigation stopped. I said that I had asked for the investigation, and that, so far as I was concerned, it should go on. A short while after that Mr. George K. Chase, as I understand, was appointed to go to Kentucky and make an investigation. He called upon me and informed me of his mission, saying that he was the man appointed to go, and he asked me to make some suggestions. I told him that all that I knew was what I had heard from my constituents in the form of complaints, but I wrote to him this letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 25, 1876.

SIR: In compliance with your request that I should give you the names of some persons in my district who could aid you in discovering what irregularities, if any, have been practiced where parties were charged with infractions of the United States internal-revenue laws, I have to say that I can only name a few persons, who will give you, as I suppose, all the information desired concerning the object of your mission. You should go to London, Ky., and after consulting with Mr. C. B. Faris, United States court, call such persons for examination as he may name.

You should see Maj. A. T. Wood, of Mount Sterling, Ky. (who was then a commissioner), and inform him of the result of your investigation of the matter referred to in his letter. He doubtless can name persons whom you should examine.

I suggest that your investigation should cover the following points, as well as others which may possibly suggest themselves to you, namely:

Whether persons arrested have been imprisoned (in jails) before their cases were examined into or tried.

Whether persons arrested have been taken, say, to Louisville or other distant points, when their cases could have been examined into by a United States commissioner who may have resided nearer to where the arrest was made, who could have held over, admitted to bail, or discharged the party arrested.

Whether persons arrested must be taken before the officer issuing the warrant for examination, regardless of the expense, inconvenience, and hardship attending such a course.

This, I understand, is the ruling of the United States district attorney for Kentucky, and I desire to know by what authority he makes such ruling.

Require a statement from the United States district attorney for Kentucky, giving the names, county of residence, by what deputy arrested, by whom warrant was issued, before whom examination was held, disposition made of the person arrested, for what arrested, from —— to July 20, 1876. In short, have the district attorney and the marshal done no more than their duty?

Yours, &c.,

JOHN D. WHITE,
Member of Congress Ninth District Kentucky.

Mr. G. K. CHASE,
Department of Justice.

Q. Did you get any response to the letter?

A. There was no response necessary. I had been complaining for some months to the Department of Justice, but no action had been taken until along in July, when Mr. Chase was designated to go to Kentucky to make an investigation. As I had asked for the investigation which led to Mr. Chase's appointment I suppose he thought I could give him some points, and he called upon me, and these were the best I could give him. I had no prejudice in the case and had no desire to injure the marshal or the district attorney, but simply to stop (if it could be done) sending drunken deputies out with blank warrants to arrest men for no other purpose, seemingly, than to run up costs against the Government.

Q. You spoke of drunken deputies coming to your district.

A. Yes. This man Wyatt (I never saw him, but I understood that he was the marshal's right-hand man for the mountains) was frequently in my district, and I could hear of him being drunk nearly everywhere I heard of him.

Q. You speak of blank warrants. What do you mean by that?

A. I never saw any of the blank warrants; but my understanding of the way that arrests were made was this: They had warrants that were issued in Louisville for the prisoner to be returned to Louisville, and no names were inserted in the warrants until the deputies got where they could arrest a man against whom there was a charge, and could find a witness or two who wanted to go to Louisville at the Government expense. Then they would put the man's name in the warrant and arrest him. That is my understanding of the way it has been done for years, and I can assure you that it has not done the executive department of this Government any credit, without regard to any political feeling.

Q. You mean in your locality?

A. I mean in the whole State so far as I am informed. Of course, I heard more complaints from my district than from elsewhere; but my understanding is that that is the rule throughout the whole State. Until after this investigation by Mr. Chase it was the rule to bring prisoners to Louisville, no matter in what part of the State they were arrested, although there were a good many United States commissioners holding office throughout the State before whom they might have been brought. The cases tried before these other commissioners were very few.

Q. Everything seemed to have gravitated to Louisville?

A. Yes; I might show you that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue recognizes this fact now, even if he did not then. In his report to the Secretary of the Treasury, November 25, 1881, he says: "The district attorney is made the judge of the propriety of commencing a criminal prosecution against a citizen, on account of which he and the marshal will receive pay from the Government whether the party be guilty or innocent. These officers may prefer complaints against citizens, cause United States commissioners to issue warrants, may arrest and examine the parties before the commissioner, and the district attorney, marshal, guard, witnesses, and the commissioner will all get their fees from the Government, even though the party arrested be discharged." That is just the way I have mentioned about the man Adams who was arrested in Letcher County, when the warrant called for the arrest of his brother.

The CHAIRMAN. And he protested that he was not the person named in the warrant at the time of his arrest?

The WITNESS. So I am informed. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue further says:

"Instances have been brought to my attention where numerous prosecutions have been instituted for the most trivial violations of law (it was a general amnesty for these trivial violations of law that I was seeking, and, as I understand, it was such an amnesty that President Hayes granted in Georgia and some other Southern States), and the arrested parties taken long distances and subjected to great inconvenience and expense, not in the interest of the Government, but apparently for no other reason than to make costs."

In some remarks that I made on the floor of the House last year I made these quotations from the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to the Secretary of the Treasury of November 25, 1881. That was my understanding in 1875, and I was trying to stop that very thing.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You state that you called attention to these abuses in a speech in the House of Representatives?

A. Yes; these remarks were made by me at the last session of Congress.

Q. And at that time you called attention to these abuses in your capacity as Representative?

A. Yes.

Q. The abuses had then been going on for a number of years, but had been more flagrant, perhaps, before Mr. Wharton's removal than afterward?

A. Yes; there has been a decided improvement since Mr. Chase's investigation in the matter of arrests and in the matter of treating prisoners. When Mr. Chase returned to Washington and informed me that he had investigated the facts as far as he could in the short time that he had while out in Kentucky, and that things were a great deal worse than I had represented to the Department of Justice, in a little while President Grant removed both Wharton and Murray.

Q. Were you made aware of the circumstances under which Wharton was removed?

A. No, sir.

Mr. FYAN: Were they removed or did they resign?

The WITNESS. I will explain that. Mr. John M. Harlan came to me and made an earnest appeal for Murray. He said that Murray's deputies may have done wrong, but that he did not believe that Murray had done so, and he wanted me to appeal to the President in Murray's behalf. I declined to do so, stating that I had asked the investigation without any malice or prejudice, and that if on the investigation Murray and Wharton were found guilty I could not intercede in their behalf. They were removed. The President asked me to name a man for district attorney. I named Mr. Wood, but he declined. I then named Mr. Finley, who had been elected to Congress in 1870 I believe, but had lost his seat by some errors in the returns, when Mr. Adams was seated. Mr. Finley was a very prominent man in the mountains of Kentucky and I thought he would give general satisfaction. I had had no chance to communicate with him before naming him. He was appointed. However, when Mr. Hayes came in he removed Mr. Finley, and Mr. Finley wrote this letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 29, 1877.

SIR: As requested in our interview with your excellency some days since, I make the following statement.

First. That my predecessor in office allowed and permitted United States commissioners in the city of Louisville to issue warrants and put on foot prosecutions against the citizens of the State without consulting him, his assistants, in the collection of internal revenue for the district. The result was that the Government was wronged out of thousands of dollars in money in consequence of expense incurred by fruitless and unnecessary prosecutions against the citizens of the State, and by which they were harassed and imbittered against the Government and its officers.

Second. That my predecessor allowed and permitted United States commissioners in the city of Lousiville, and the marshal and his deputies, to force all parties charged with offenses against the Government to Louisville for preliminary investigation before United States commissioners, in disregard of the rights of the citizens, at a great sacrifice of money to the Government for transporting prisoners, guards, and witnesses from distant parts of the State, forcing the citizens past competent United States commissioners near their homes, before whom they had a right to be tried, thereby enlarging the fees of the United States attorney, the marshal, guards, and witnesses.

Third. My predecessor allowed and permitted the Government to be wronged out of thousands of dollars in money by reason of unnecessary guards and false and fictitious charges for guards, when it was his duty to prevent it and when he must have had knowledge of these frauds.

It was in consequence of this and other irregularities and failure of duty that he was discharged from office after investigation had. An investigation now will, if put on foot, show these abuses, and will exhibit the fact that prosecutions of a similar character do not cost the Government one-half what they did under his management and supervision. An investigation will develop the further fact that there are now a greater number of convictions had in proportion to the number of prosecutions set on foot.

I have heretofore asked that the frauds in the custom-house in Louisville be investigated. My letters upon this subject are on file in the office of the Attorney-General, in which I specifically point out frauds and suggest that an investigation will develop many others. I desire this investigation very much, as it will enable your excellency and Attorney-General to understand what action was necessary to be taken looking to an honest administration of offices in Kentucky.

I then and now urged that an investigation was not had, or it would have given me aid in my efforts to correct the abuses referred to. Nevertheless I hope at a proper time an investigation will be had, when I flatter myself your excellency will be able to appreciate and understand why my removal from this position has been so earnestly and persistently sought.

I am not at this time proposing to put on foot an investigation by which to establish what I have stated, but I will, if an investigation is desired, give the names of persons and refer to papers that will establish what I have stated.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. F. FINLEY,
United States Attorney Kentucky District.

His Excellency R. B. HAYES.

The WITNESS. Mr. Finley was district attorney for a very short while. He was removed, and Mr. Wharton was reappointed by Mr. Hayes on the recommendation, as I understand, of ex-Secretary Bristow. I do not know about that.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How long did Mr. Wharton then remain in office?

A. He remained until he resigned to come here last session of Congress to lobby for the whisky bill.

Q. What became of Marshal Murray?

A. Marshal Murray was appointed governor of Utah.

Q. By whom?

A. By President Hayes; I do not know on whose recommendation.

Q. How long after his removal from the office of marshal of Kentucky?

A. Murray was allowed to resign, I think; Wharton was removed.

Q. Murray resigned under pressure of these charges and the examination by Mr. Chase?

A. So I understood from the Department of Justice at the time.

Q. Who is district attorney of Kentucky now?

A. George M. Thomas.

Q. Are these abuses going on there at this time?

A. I think not; still there is some complaint yet. This is a very significant report—"Report made by the United States attorney for the district of Kentucky for the period from July 1, 1880, to June 30, 1881"—in the following particulars:

Number of cases returned to court by commissioners:

Louisville circuit	434
Paducah circuit	4
Total	438

Number of cases ignored by grand jury. (No record kept.)

Number of cases prosecuted to acquittal:

Louisville circuit	27
Paducah circuit	1
Total	28

Number of cases prosecuted to conviction:

Louisville	255
Total	258

There were four hundred and thirty-eight cases returned, and only two hundred and fifty-eight convictions. When you consider the distances which these men are taken, and the disadvantages under which they labor to prove anything in their own defense, their trial is almost a star-chamber proceeding.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Is there anything to show what distances these men were taken? Kentucky is a large State, and a good many of them may have come from the neighborhood of Louisville.

A. Yes; a good many of them may have.

Q. You do not mean to say that they all came from your district?

A. I should hope not. I imagine that a very small percentage of them came from my district.

Q. Of course you do not pretend to say that they were all taken long distances. You can not tell what proportion of them were taken long distances?

A. No; but I should think that a statement of this kind on its very face would lead an inquisitive mind to want to know the bottom facts. I refer to it for that only.

I read from the same report:

Total amount of fees for self and salaries of assistants:

G. C. Wharton	$6,516 16
G. M. Thomas	150 94
Total	6,667 10

I certify the foregoing statement to be correct and true.

Witness my hand this 15th day of October, 1881.

GEORGE M. THOMAS,
United States District Attorney.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What period does that report cover?

A. From July 1, 1880, to June 30, 1881. You asked me if there had been any improvement since 1876. It is not very clear to my mind that during Mr. Wharton's latter administration of the office of district attorney there was any very great improvement.

Q. You were born in Kentucky, I believe.

A. Yes.

Q. And have been a citizen of Kentucky all your life?

A. Yes.

Q. Are you well acquainted in different parts of the State with people in Kentucky?

A. For a young man I am tolerably well acquainted throughout the State.

Q. What do you say as to the character of the people of the State as law-abiding citizens as compared with other States of the Union?

A. The people of Kentucky have submitted, especially the poor people, who have been harassed by the Federal officers and deputy marshals, in a way which I did not believe they could tolerate.

Q. You thought it beyond human endurance?

A. Yes.

Q. For any people to be subjected to such treatment and submit to it peaceably?

A. Yes. In the city of Lexington, partly through the impulse of the majority (or the powerful minority, I should say) and by the aid of the Legislature of Kentucky, there has been a good deal of political tyranny and some bulldozing, but I am not aware that there has been in any other part of the State. There has been none of it in my district. I suppose you allude to that.

Q. What I mean is as to whether the people of Kentucky are disposed to obey the laws of the United States.

A. I think so.

Q. As compared with other parts of the country?

A. I think they are as law-abiding in Kentucky as in any other part of the United States.

Q. The object of my question was to ascertain whether the people of Kentucky were so disposed toward the United States as to make it necessary that such vigorous measures of prosecution should be instituted by the Government in order to enforce the laws of the United States.

A. Oh, certainly not. I may say, as an illustration, that at the first tap of the drum at the outbreak of the rebellion the people in my district, especially in the mountain counties, volunteered more freely than the people of any other part of the country.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. On the side of the Union?

A. On the side of the Union. It was the same with the other mountainous districts. Kentucky itself was loyal until the war closed. She never seceded until the war was over.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What do you say as to the character of the people in regard to their disposition to obey the internal-revenue laws in your part of the State as compared with the people living in the Paducah district, where there appear to have been so few arrests made?

A. It is notorious that the people of the mountainous region in Kentucky were most loyal. What I mean by loyal is that they were most law-abiding.

Q. Then in your judgment there was no necessity for the prosecution of the people in that remote part of the State any more than in any other part of the State, if the desire was simply to enforce the revenue laws?

A. Certainly not.

Q. Then you say that if the object of the Federal officials was simply to enforce the collection of the revenues of the Government, the people of that part of the State which you represent were as well disposed to obey those laws as the people in any other part of the State of Kentucky or any other part of the country?

A. I think so, unquestionably, without intending to cast any reflection upon any other part of the State. When I look back for six or eight years I am surprised that they have been so law-abiding as they have been.

Q. Why so?

A. For instance, suppose a man should arrest me, as that man Adams was arrested in Letcher County, I would carry that case to the Supreme Court if it took every dollar I had in the world. I would never suffer it. I would resist it at the point of the bayonet if it were necessary. It is a terrible degradation for a man to submit to a drunken Federal official simply because he is an official, when the man knows that he is entirely innocent, and when he wants to prove by his neighbors that he is not the man called for in the warrant—it is a terrible degradation, I say, for such a man to be dragged off two hundred and fifty miles.

Q. Was that man imprisoned on the way to Louisville?

A. I understood that he was, just as any other prisoner would be.

Q. Do you know whether guards were charged also for conducting him there?

A. I do not; but I expect that you will find such charges among the papers. Two or three years ago there were some forty-odd men arrested in Whitley

County, and were taken to Louisville on charges, as I am informed, from three to five years old for some petty violations of the law. Many of them were as innocent of the charges as babes. But when all the fees were got out of the business, then the district attorney recommended a pardon for them, and they were all pardoned. These occurred two or three years ago.

Q. How far is Whitley County from Louisville?

A. I expect it is about two hundred miles.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Were these men convicted?

A. I think that none of them were.

Q. Then they could not have been pardoned; you mean that the cases were nolle prosequied.

A. I accept the correction. The cases were nolle prosequied; the men were let go.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. They came under that clause of the Attorney-General's report, "Nolle prosequied, quashed, or dismissed?"

A. Yes; that idea was the one that I had when I tried to find the names, residences, and offenses of persons charged with these petty violations in 1876. I wanted to make a clean slate of the petty offenses.

Q. In 1876 you were of opinion that offenses had really been committed, and that these officials were vigorously prosecuting their duties, and therefore you were trying to have amnesty extended to the offenders?

A. Not at all. I was convinced that the charges were for the most part for trifling, petty offenses, like selling a half pound of tobacco or a pint of whisky. I can give you a case of that kind. We have prohibition in more towns in Kentucky than a man from Maine or Iowa would dream of. In the town of Barboursville prohibition, or local option, was enforced. Some man (I forget his name) had a quart or a gallon of whisky, and was passing before a house and gave some of it to a member of the family for sickness, as it was claimed. The member of the family paid him for it. That was a violation of the local-option law, and the man was punished according to the law of the locality. This was in the town of Barboursville, Knox County, about one hundred and seventy miles from Louisville. These spies and informers looked up that case, and had a warrant issued, and the man was arrested and taken to Louisville, where he was sentenced to imprisonment for sixty days and a fine of $100. The fine he could not pay, and he ate it out at the expense of the Government.

Mr. FYAN. Did not a good many people violate the internal-revenue law in ignorance of the law in selling tobacco?

The WITNESS. No; it was not ignorance. A man, for instance, who has fought in the Army three years, and has a little piece of ground which is better for tobacco than anything else (a piece twice as large as this room), raises a few pounds of tobacco on it more than he can use himself; he finds he can sell it for ready cash—little twists of it. He does not think that that is such an offense that anybody will ever notice it. He does it without thinking that it is as serious a matter as it is. He does not think that the Government is going to hound him down like a wild Indian for that little offense, and so he commits it.

Mr. FYAN. Technically it is a violation of the law?

The WITNESS. Technically it is a violation of the law.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. And so in the sale of liquor?

A. So the sale of that pint of whisky was a violation of the law; but you can see at once what a feeling of indignation is apt to be aroused from punishing a man twice for the petty offense of selling one pint of whisky.

Q. Would you not suggest, in regard to that, that it would be better to modify the law?

A. Certainly; I have proclaimed that all the time.

Q. It is the fault of the law?

A. Not altogether.

Q. Suppose that the whole community should give itself up to that kind of traffic, would it not be a general violation of a United States statute?

A. Certainly.

Mr. FYAN. The law was that no producer of tobacco had any right to sell it, except the party to whom he sold it had a license. Now, however, the law has been changed so that the producer can sell tobacco to the amount of $25.

The WITNESS. Yes; I only speak of that to show you why I asked for a general amnesty where warrants have issued for the arrest of men charged with such petty offenses.

Mr. STEWART. The object of my inquiry was germane to what the chair asked you a little while ago about the general observance of law by the people of Kentucky. I suppose it is probably true that in that community there was more or less retailing of liquor without license and more or less selling of tobacco without license.

The WITNESS. I suppose so, in that community as in other communities.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Knowing these people and their habits of life and their general disposition to observe the law, do you consider that these complaints, frivolous and stale, were really instituted and arrests made more for the purpose of putting money in the pockets of the officers than for the purpose of a proper enforcement of the law?

A. Yes; for the purpose of running up costs rather than for the enforcement of the law. You have expressed the idea better than I had done. I indorse every word of that. In answer to the question of the chairman as to whether these officials were endeavoring properly to enforce the law, I say no. They were simply hungering for public pap—looking for fees, in my judgment.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Do you think it was their duty to omit prosecuting these offenses at all?

A. No; not at all.

Q. They did not make the law, and they were executive officers. Was it their duty to sit by and see the community disregard generally the laws?

A. I shall have to read to you again what the Commissioner of Internal Revenue says, as embodying my views:

"Instances have been brought to my attention where numerous prosecutions have been instituted for the most trifling violations of law, and the arrested parties taken long distances, and subjected to great inconvenience and expense, not in the interest of the Government, but apparently for no other reason than to make costs."

That is the best answer I can make to your question.

Mr. FYAN. Was not this tobacco law regarded as so obnoxious in those small communities where they grow tobacco that the people did not feel disposed to obey it? Was not that the general feeling until the law was changed?

The WITNESS. It was always felt that it was a very harsh and unnecessary law.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. In your speech in last Congress you refer to the fact that these officials in Kentucky—District Attorney Wharton and Marshal Murray—were retained in their positions by "the seductive influences of certain Democrats and the sycophantic class of office-seeking Republicans." Can you state what influences, to your knowledge, were brought to bear by Democrats to keep these gentlemen in their places?

A. My understanding is, as I stated a while ago, that Mr. Wharton was reappointed to please Mr. B. H. Bristow. The Senate Judiciary Committee at that time was Republican. As I understand, the committee had these papers from the Department of Justice, or at least some of the facts before it, and it refused to recommend him to the Senate for confirmation. The Senate was Democratic, and did confirm him. So I hold that Mr. Hayes and the Democratic Senate were responsible for Mr. Wharton's subsequent acts.

The CHAIRMAN. You must excuse my predicating any questions to you from words spoken by you in debate in the House of Representatives. I have no right to put such a question to you, and if you have any objection to it it can be stricken from the record.

The WITNESS. No, sir; I have no objection.

Q. What are the other influences which were at work? You spoke of some prominent Republicans trying to have these gentlemen retained in office, or one of them.

A. Yes; I think I mentioned that after Mr. Chase's report was made John M. Harlan came to my room and made an appeal to me in behalf of Murray—to intercede for Murray's retention, but I declined to do so.

Q. Why did you decline?

A. Simply because I could not interfere with an execution of my own request. My request was that the Department of Justice should investigate the conduct of the marshal, deputy marshals, and the commissioners, and district attorney in Kentucky. An agent of the Department had done so and had recommended after that investigation the removal of these men. I could not consistently ask the Department not to remove men who had been found guilty after investigation.

Q. Did you give any reason to Harlan?

A. That was the reason I gave. I said that I had no prejudice against Mr. Murray and that I was very sorry if he was implicated in this bad conduct in Kentucky, but that I could not request his being retained; and I did not request his being retained. Neither did I ask to have him removed.

Q. Had you any conversation with Mr. Chase about his investigation, other than that which you have already stated in relation to the investigation by him?

A. Yes.

Q. State what it was.

A. When I was elected to the Forty-seventh Congress, I was in the Department of Justice one day trying to get a copy of Mr. Chase's report. I was referred to Mr. Chase. Mr. Chase told me that the papers which he had were private papers, and had never been filed. I wanted the papers on which he had based his judgment, when he told me that the case was a good deal worse than it had been represented to me. He informed me that the papers on which his report was made were his private papers, and had not been filed.

Q. Did you ask to be shown those papers?

A. Yes, sir; he drew out quite a lot of them, more, I think, than you have here. They may be the same papers. They may have been afterward filed. I do not know about that. But he showed me a paper where Mr. Murray had arrested a man in his office, or in the building, and had charged mileage, and guards, and meals, and everything else—constructive fees—from the man's remote home to the city of Louisville.

Q. How many miles was that?

A. I do not recollect now. He showed me the paper. Then I asked the Attorney-General to have Mr. Chase file the papers; but I have never been informed whether that has been done.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Do you recollect the name of the man arrested?

A. No, sir; I do not. I think I took a memorandum of it at the time, but I had no idea of being summoned here until yesterday, and I did not look for it. In fact I do not know where to find it. But I think I took a memorandum of the name and the date. Mr. Chase showed me a few other papers of that character and satisfied me that he was correct in his statement that the thing was worse than I had represented, for I had not dreamed of such a case as that when I asked for an investigation.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State more in detail the conversation that you had with Mr. Chase in regard to his investigation and why he had not filed the papers.

A. I think he said he had not been requested to file the papers; that as both the men concerning whom he had reported had been removed it was not thought necessary to file the papers, and so he had not done so.

Q. Did he decline to show them to you?

A. No, sir; it was only for lack of time and inclination on my part that I did not go through the whole batch of them. I supposed that as he was still an officer of the Department he would file them, if the Attorney-General asked him to do so, and so I made a request to the Attorney-General to have those papers filed.

Q. Did you make that request verbally or in writing?

A. I am not certain which, but I think it was in writing. Mr. Ward, a lawyer in Louisville (I forget his initials), asked to be furnished with a copy of those papers, or he wrote to me to know if they were on file, and that is the way that I came to look into the matter. I found that they were not on file. My recollection is that I filed Mr. Ward's letter in the Department of Justice, and requested that the evidence taken by Mr. Chase when he was in Kentucky be filed in the Department of Justice. I have never learned that that was done, and I am inclined to think that it was not done.

Q. Do you know where Mr. Chase is now?

A. No, sir. I have not seen him to talk to him from that time to this, I believe.

Q. Did Mr. Chase say to you that he had not made a written report in the case?

A. I think he did; and I read this morning the statement of H. Diven, indorsed by G. K. Chase, on August 8, 1876. I had never seen it before; I think that Mr. Chase told me he had not made a thorough report, but had made a statement; that he had given the Department the benefit of his investigation—the conclusion which he had come to—but had never made a written report, nor filed the testimony which he had taken.

Mr. FYAN. Did you understand that he made a personal examination himself?

The WITNESS. Yes; he went in person to Kentucky. I think Mr. Ward wrote a letter saying that these papers ought not to be lost, but ought to be filed.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What was the nature of Mr. Ward's letter?

A. It was saying that there was very important evidence in the papers which Chase had got when he was in Kentucky, and that it ought not to be lost. That letter of Mr. Ward's I am quite certain I filed in the Department of Justice, with the request that the evidence taken by Mr. Chase be filed in the Department. [After examining papers from the Department:] Here seems to be a memorandum in my handwriting, which I suppose I gave to Mr. Chase. It is simply a statement that I was informed that "C. B. Faris, in the spring of 1876, issued a warrant for Joe Broughton. He was arrested by Jim MacStewart, a special bailiff authorized by Deputy Marshal John Wyatt; was taken through London, at which place Broughton demanded to be tried before Commissioner Faris, and Faris proffered to give receipt for prisoner, and said he would try him next day, Monday. The witness objected to going beyond London, but Bailiff Stewart replied that Deputy Marshal Wyatt had instructed him to bring prisoner to Louisville, and took him on."

The CHAIRMAN. Is that a memorandum that was given to Mr. Chase for the purpose of aiding him in the investigation?

The WITNESS. Yes. [Continuing to read:]

"Warrant had issued some months previous; perhaps 1875. "In the latter part of June, 1876, Gilmore House, of Clay, was taken to Louisville, kept a day in London, but, as warrant issued in Louisville, was taken on to latter city." Of course I do not claim to know personally any of these things.

The CHAIRMAN. If you find among your papers the memorandum which you took in reference to the case to which Chase referred (the arrest made in Marshal Murray's office and the mileage charged from the prisoner's home), will you furnish it to the committee?

The WITNESS. I will, if I can find it. I should think that Mr. Chase would have all these papers. He told me that they were his private papers.

Mr. FYAN. Did I understand you to say that the Attorney-General promised you that these papers should be filed?

The WITNESS. I made the request, but I never received any information that they were filed.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. From your observations in the State of Kentucky, when you have been traveling through different parts of the State, and from the letters which you have received from your constituents and others in that State, what information have you to give to the committee as to the existence of a system of frivolous arrests and prosecutions under the internal-revenue laws of the United States, during the time covered by the administration of Marshal Murray and up to the present time?

A. The information which I had, and I think the prevalent belief in the State of Kentucky was, that there was collusion between the district attorney and the commissioner and the marshal for running up fees against the Government, and that, instead of attempting to execute the laws where the Government was losing the most money, they devoted their time to hunting up cases which would bring in the most fees.

Q. And those against what class?

A. Against the poorest and most humble class in the State.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. And to the neglect of the prosecution of the powerful combinations, where there was most likely to be the greatest incentive to actual fraud against the Government?

A. That was the belief in Kentucky; and I must say, from all the evidence that came to me, that I was inclined to believe that was true.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Were those abuses confined to any particular locality?

A. No, sir.

Q. They were general throughout the State?

A. I think so.

Q. But more flagrant, I understand you to say, in the parts most remote from the city of Louisville, where the court was held?

A. It seemed so, taking into consideration the sparsely populated region, the number of arrests, and the number of releases in which no case could be made out. That did not deter them from going right ahead with arrests, because the arrest of an innocent man gave them as much of fees as the arrest of a guilty man, and they had a good deal less trouble with the innocent man.

Q. Do you know when those abuses began?

A. I never heard of them, that I can recollect, until 1872, when I was assistant in canvass for Presidential electors. They may have existed before that time. I was a school-boy before that time and at that time. I was in Michigan University within ten days after the election. They have existed more or less up to this time, I suppose, from the accounts that reach me, but in a very much less aggravated form during the last year or two than previously.

Q. You spoke about the citizens of Kentucky exhibiting great forbearance toward deputy marshals, in view of their conduct. To what did you refer?

A. I refer to this: In the city of Louisville, for instance, there is a distillery which makes daily four hundred barrels of high wines. No one can tell within twenty-five gallons how much they make daily. By measuring the whisky after it is made, and weighing the grain before it is distilled, and by mathematical calculations they approximate the quantity, but still they can not tell exactly how much is made. The belief is that the collectors in the districts where those large distilleries exist are appointed through political influence, without regard to party, and with recommendations of the distillers themselves. I believe that their subordinates, storekeepers and gaugers, in many cases are appointed by the same influences. The fact that the distillers make so much whisky, can ship it out of the country without paying any tax, and that they have so much machinery around them, so much whisky in bonded warehouses, under the guard of certain individuals appointed under those influences which I have named, the fact that there are seldom any arrests for frauds in these distilleries, or that any irregularities are even hinted at, where it is believed there is so much inducement to commit fraud; and the further fact that in the remote localities arrests were so very frequent—and that of a class of persons who have no inducement to violate the law for money making, but who sell a pint of whisky, or who take an old tea-kettle and gun-barrel and make a quart or a gallon of whisky—all these facts tend to much suspicion. Every man who can be found who punched a fire, or who carried a bucket of water to drink where any of this stuff is made, is technically a violator of the law, and every one of these fellows is hunted up.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Or if he sells any grain to these illicit distilleries?

The WITNESS. Yes, or if he sells any grain to them. All these fellows, I say, were hunted up and taken to the remotest part of the State. This has made an intense feeling in many parts of the State—a feeling that on the one hand there is no disposition to ferret out the frauds of the big distilleries, where great frauds may be committed, and to prosecute for petty violations of the law where the Government can not possibly lose anything of account. That has made a good deal of feeling. I have said that I am surprised, when all the facts are considered, that there is not more resistance than there has been. These men, as a rule, yield readily. They go readily with the deputy marshal, and frequently go without any deputy marshal accompanying them. They go simply on their honor, and report at Louisville for trial, and submit to the penalty. That is what I allude to. I think they have been remarkably law-abiding, when all the facts are considered.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Did your observation, or the information which you have derived from complaints, go to the extent of enabling you to say whether these complaints were founded principally upon confessions derived from some of the parties accused, or did the complaints rest upon direct proof—aliunde to the parties accused?

A. If I understand you correctly, I would say that many times it was believed that the warrants were issued on the statement of parties wholly irresponsible, of parties who had some personal difficulty with the persons complained against, or who wanted a free ride, at the Government expense, from remote localities to the city of Louisville, as witnesses. Is that any answer to your question?

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I accept it as an answer; but I thought it likely enough that there would be espionage, and that these officials might get hold of some simple fellow and get a confession from him on which to base charges.

The WITNESS. I have heard of such cases as that also; but I think the other cases more common.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you know what relations existed between Mr. Chase and Marshal Murray; whether they were personally friendly?

A. No, sir; I do not.

Q. From all that you know, you think that the investigation by Mr. Chase was thorough, and that, as he informed you, it resulted in proving more than you have ever charged?

A. I presume so. He proceeded to show me some of the papers, and when I asked him why they were not filed he said they did not require to be filed. He said that Murray and Wharton had been both removed on his statement when he returned, and that it was thought unnecessary to file the papers. But he certainly had them, because he showed me quite a lot, which he said contained evidence that he had taken out there, and he pointed to one or two papers in particular.

Q. Were there other papers that reflected on the integrity of Mr. Murray?

A. He showed me several other papers, but did not read them to me. His language was something like this: that Murray was a scoundrel, and there was no question about it.

Adjourned until Friday next.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 25, 1884.

GEORGE K. CHASE sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Please state your age, residence, and occupation.

Answer. My age is 46; I reside in New York city; I am a lawyer.

Q. Have you at any time heretofore been connected with the service of the Government?

A. I have.

Q. In what capacity?

A. I was employed as a general agent, I expect, of the Department of Justice; I do not know just what you might call the capacity in which I was employed, but I was so employed from September, 1875, to February, 1882, about seven years.

Q. During that time was it your duty, among other things, to make examinations into the accounts of court officials?

A. Not a part of my duty exactly, but I made such examinations when directed by the Attorney-General; I had no special duties.

Q. Your duty was to perform such service as you were directed to perform by the Attorney-General?

A. Yes; I was under the direction of the Attorney-General.

Q. Did the Attorney-General at any time direct you to make any examination of charges preferred against Marshal Murray, of Kentucky?

A. He did.

Q. When was that? State the circumstances under which you made that examination.

A. Sometime during 1875, I think, a charge was preferred against Marshal Murray, of Kentucky, as appears from this paper [consulting a paper].

Q. Do you remember the circumstances under which you were directed to make that examination?

A. Yes; I was directed by the Attorney-General to investigate the charges, and I proceeded to Kentucky for that purpose.

Q. Were there any letters on the subject from Representative WHITE, of Kentucky?

A. Yes; there were letters from Representative WHITE, inclosing newspaper slips.

Q. What time did you proceed to Kentucky?

A. The only data I would have to go by in answering that would be this paper—August 1, 1876—a statement by one Henry Diven.

Q. State whether the paper now shown you is one of the papers filed by you as a part of your report, setting forth the result of your examination.

A. This paper is the result of my examination there; at the same time it never was filed in the Department.

Q. But it was found in the Department, I think.

A. Yes, sir; I believe it was.

Q. You recognize it as your original paper?

A. Yes; I recognize this as the original paper.

Q. At the bottom of that paper I see the following indorsement:

The within statement is made by Henry Diven, of Louisville, Ky., formerly United States deputy marshal for nine years last past. He resigned on January 4, 1876. I find Diven's character for veracity beyond question. I have investigated the within statements, and I find them substantially true.

C. K. CHACE.

State what pains you took for the purpose of ascertaining the truth of Diven's statement?

A. I had a number of people brought to me from different parts of that country. I saw a number of persons in relation to the matter, but I can not remember them now; in fact, I have forgotten almost all about it, but I have read this statement over carefully, and I remember that at the time I found it to be substantially correct.

Q. You have read this statement over since you have been here this time?

A. Yes, sir; since I have been in this room.

Q. And having refreshed your memory in regard to the matter, you now recall the fact that the statements herein contained were proven before you substantially?

A. Yes, sir; substantially. There may have been some little variation in the proof, but this statement I found to be substantially correct.

Q. Do you remember anything as to the following paragraph in this statement of Mr. Diven:

"I will state that when John R. Reno was United States collector in one of the Kentucky districts he came up here (Louisville) to attend a meeting of the Grand Army of the Republic, and he was paid on the witness-rolls about $100, when he was not a witness in any case.

A. I can not remember definitely about that, but I have no doubt it was true. I can not remember, however, specifically about that case.

Q. Did you examine the witness-rolls of the marshal's office to ascertain the fact as to whether that sum of money was paid to Mr. Reno as a witness?

A. I am not certain, but I think I did.

Q. That is one of the items in Diven's statement, is it not?

A. I understand that it is.

Q. Did you also make inquiry as to whether Reno had actually appeared as a witness in any case?

A. I think I consulted the district attorney about that, and I think he satisfied me—at least in some way I became satisfied that that statement was true, although I don't say so now positively, because I can not recall the circumstances.

Q. Who was the United States district attorney at that time?

A. Mr. Wharton.

Q. Did Mr. Wharton co-operate with you in making this investigation, and give you any assistance that you asked for?

A. He did.

Q. What information, if any, did you get from Mr. Wharton in regard to the truth of those charges against the marshal?

A. He agreed with me that Henry Diven's statement was true; we went before the judge; the judge was a particular friend of Marshal Murray's, but Mr. Wharton always said to me that I had a good case against Murray, and stated further that Diven was a very reliable man; I got my information as to Diven's character from Mr. Wharton, the district attorney, and from Judge Ballard; Judge Ballard was very emphatic as to Diven's character; he said Diven was a straight man in every way.

Q. Did you consult the judge with regard to the truth of the charges in Diven's statement?

A. I did.

Q. What did he say about that?

A. I can not recall now exactly what he said, but I know he was very friendly to Murray—very friendly to Murray.

Q. Did he insist that the charges were true, or that they were not true?

A. Well, he rather admitted that the charges were true, but attempted to excuse constructive mileage and constructive service. He said that the marshal received a summons for the witness before the grand jury, and, of course, it was his duty to summon him, and if on arriving at Paducah they found that for some reason the case was postponed or the witness could not be used, the marshal was not responsible.

Q. Then, the judge had his attention called to the nature of the charges against the marshal?

A. Yes, sir; he had that paper in his hand. Marshal Murray has also had that paper in his hands.

Q. Did Murray in your presence deny specifically the statements that were made with regard to these constructive fees?

A. No, sir; he admitted some of them and amended one, the McCord warrant.

Q. What did he say in regard to that?

A. He admitted that Diven's statement was true, and amended his charge against the Government in that case accordingly. I had the original McCord warrant with these papers, and there was another paper with the newspaper charges which I do not see here.

Q. The statement with regard to McCord is this: "In December, 1875, Mat. McCord was brought to this city (Louisville) from Livermore, charged with having deposited in the post-office for the purpose of being carried by mail certain circulars concerning illegal lotteries. In relation to that case I would state that the prisoner, McCord, was brought here by a private citizen from Livermore without any warrant, and without the marshal's knowledge. The marshal charged for going for him and bringing him with a guard. The marshal himself returns on the back of the warrant fees to the amount of $82.60." Did you call Marshal Murray's attention to that statement?

A. I did. I showed him the original warrant in his own handwriting all the way through, and he admitted that there was no guard, but he said that was the only way he could pay Hackett, who brought the prisoner down.

Q. Hackett was not a deputy marshal, was he?

A. No; but he was the man who brought the prisoner down. That matter comes to my mind from reading a letter of Mr. Wharton's here.

Q. Who was Hackett?

A. I do not remember.

Q. He was not an officer of the Government?

A. No, sir; I think he was a postmaster.

Q. Did the marshal say that he had paid Hackett any money for bringing the man down?

A. He claimed that he had.

Q. Did he present any vouchers from Hackett?

A. No, sir; but he claimed that he had paid him $30.

Q. That would not cover the charge of $82 that he made against the Government in that case?

A. No, sir; but he amended the charge and charged only $26.

Q. He amended it after you had called his attention to it?

A. No; he had amended it before I called his attention to it. He knew that I was coming.

Q. That fact had been made public in advance of your going?

A. Yes, sir; through the newspapers.

Q. Did he present this charge of $82 in his emolument returns?

A. I think not. He withdrew it. He had it made out in that way, but it did not come to Washington.

Q. You say the marshal justified the charge on the ground that he had to pay Hackett?

A. Yes, sir; on the ground that he had to pay Hackett $30 for bringing the prisoner in.

Q. Did he explain why the balance of the $82.60 was charged?

A. No; he could not explain it; I had the return in his own handwriting, and it was with these papers all along; I do not know where it is now.

Q. Did you return that original paper in his handwriting to the Department of Justice?

A. Yes, sir; it was with these other papers; it ought to be here.

Q. It is not now among them?

A. It is not among them.

Q. That return, you say, was in the handwriting of Marshal Murray?

A. Yes, sir; the indorsement on the back was.

Q. How long was it after the indorsement was made by him making this charge for service which was not performed that he corrected the account?

A. I am unable to state; but I think the change in the account was the result of the newspaper article.

Q. A publication in the Louisville Courier-Journal?

A. No; in the Argus, I think.

Q. Do you remember the facts connected with the arrest of certain citizens at Lexington, referred to in this passage of Mr. Diven's statement: "In June [or Jan.] the judges of election refused to receive the votes of negroes who had not paid their poll-taxes. Gen. James F. Robinson, Dr. Chipley, J. H. Cochran, John C. Young, M. Fourchee, John Marrs, John Snyder, Rees, and others were arrested by M. T. Athey, a deputy marshal, and all came down together to Louisville without guard. The marshal charged for guards with most of them." Do you remember that case?

A. Yes, sir; Mr. Diven brought me some one who testified in relation to that. I sent up for some one to that place, who came and satisfied me that the statement was correct. I think the district attorney states in his report that there were no guards. I did not charge my mind with this matter, because when I got the information I got it all together. Mr. Murray's friends made strong efforts to have him retained and a settlement made. He was asked to resign. Then he came up here and the letter was withdrawn, and he resigned; and I was told not to make a report, and I did not make a report.

Q. You simply filed those papers?

A. I did not file them. I just left them there in my desk in the Department.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Who told you not to make a report?

A. Well, sir, the Attorney-General.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Who was the Attorney-General at that time?

A. Judge Taft.

Q. State what was the nature, generally, of the irregularities which you found in Marshal Murray's office.

A. Well, I became satisfied that there was an arrangement between Henry Diven and the marshal to this effect: That Diven was to get about a case a day against some person for alleged violation of the internal-revenue law, and, as he stated it to me, he would go into a place, even where he knew the man had a license, and would look about and say, "Well, you have not any license." The man would say, "Yes, I have; I have got it here in my case." "Well," the deputy would say, "you ought to have it in a prominent place. You have been reported about it up at the marshal's office;" and then he would tell the man to come down to the office at 1 o'clock, or 2 o'clock, or whatever the hour might be, and he would go to Mr. Merriwether, the commissioner, who would give Diven a blank warrant, and Diven would fill it up, and that would cost the Government $10, or $15, or $20. There would be really no case, and it would of course be dismissed.

Q. They intended, you think, to have about one case a day, so as to keep business going?

A. Yes, to keep it going and to keep grinding it out. The commissioner would get his $5, and the witness would get his fees. Some person would put in a fictitious name, if the attendance was before the commissioner, and the marshal would get the fee, and they would use certain names frequently. "Brent" was one name that they used, and they would use different other names as the names of the persons who attended before the commissioner, and would charge $2 for each of them. I went to those people and got a statement from them that they had never been before the commissioner at all.

Q. Who got the benefit of that fee?

A. It went into Mr. Murray's account, or that of his deputy, whoever made the service.

Q. What interest did Murray himself have in that fee?

A. I think he had 50 per cent. of the deputy's earnings, but toward the last it came about that he cut Diven down. He was not satisfied to let Diven make his fee by serving the warrant himself, but he wanted to fix him on a regular salary, and then they broke, and Diven gave the information to the newspapers, which was given to Mr. WHITE, and Mr. WHITE brought it to the notice of the Department.

Q. To what extent was that practice carried on to which you have just referred?

A. My impression is that it had run for two or three years—two years, at least.

Q. Were there any other persons in a similar business to that of Diven working up cases in other parts of the State?

A. I think the deputy marshals in other parts of the State, and all over the State, were engaged in the same business.

Q. What was the tenor of the statements made by those deputy marshals as to the kind of business that they had been carrying on?

A. They thought it was perfectly right, if a man violated the internal-revenue laws, even technically, to make complaint against him, and there was no other way the marshal could make his fee, and that it was purely to make money. That is the truth about the matter.

Q. I see the following statement in Mr. Diven's affidavit: "A deputy marshal is allowed to make $3,000 a year, which would be $1,500 for six months. When they came to make up the fee-bill for six months, if it is found that the deputy has made $2,000, for instance, instead of $1,500, during the six months, the extra $500 is transferred nominally to some deputy who has not made up the allowance. That deputy never gets the extra amount allowed him, as shown by the rolls. The emolument return ought to show exactly what the deputy makes for each six months, but the deputy has been required to sign the emolument return in blank." What did you ascertain about that?

A. That statement I found to be true.

Q. Suppose the extra amount was $500, who would get the benefit of it?

A. The marshal would get the benefit of all the money there was in it; the marshal himself.

Q. So the return would show that the deputy had earned only $1,500 for the six months?

A. Yes, sir; the marshal required all his deputies to sign the emolument returns in blank.

Q. Would any deputy not having earned the $1,500 get the benefit of it as if he had earned it?

A. No, sir.

Q. Who would get it?

A. I think the marshal would get it.

Q. How extensively was that practice carried on?

A. I don't remember. I saw a number of deputies, and they all told me that they had signed in blank. I never went into it, though otherwise I would have done. The moment this information came, and it was decided that the man had to go, it was dropped.

Q. In making your information, what did you learn in regard to the alleged practice of arresting persons in remote parts of the State and taking them past the place where the nearest United States commissioner resided to the remotest commissioner, for the purpose of making mileage?

A. I have no doubt that that was done.

Q. Was that an extensive practice?

A. I think so. It was done for the purpose of making fees.

Q. Did that practice inure to the benefit of the marshal in making his emolument returns? But he claimed to have no knowledge of these things.

A. Everything was put on his chief deputy, Farley. That is what they will claim; that they do not know anything about it themselves; but they took the fees all the same.

Q. Did not the marshal make up his emolument returns based on the returns of his deputies?

A. Yes, sir; but if anything wrong was found, they would say, "Mr. Farley is a reliable man. He belongs to one of the oldest families in the country. If there is anything wrong Farley did it, but he would not do it intentionally. Mr. Farley would not do it if it was wrong."

Q. But they all did it, nevertheless?

A. They all did it, and continue to do it.

Q. The illegal charges are continuously made?

A. I guess so.

Q. And all of them were beneficiaries of that practice?

A. I guess so. Mr. Murray's successor broke it up.

Q. Did Marshal Murray deny the practice of those deputies in making these long trips after prisoners?

A. No, sir; he admitted them. The warrant was issued, and he claimed, of course, that it was his duty to return the warrant to the commissioner who issued it, and if you spoke to him on this subject he would say, "Don't you want the process of the United States executed? It is put in my hands, and I must execute it."

Q. Why didn't they go to the nearest commissioner to make complaint in those cases?

A. They would not get as much mileage then. They would not get the trip to Louisville.

Q. Did you examine one of Mr. Murray's emolument returns?

A. No, sir; I don't think I did.

Q. Please look at the paper I now hand you and state what it is.

A. (Inspecting it.) This is an emolument return of General Eli H. Murray, which purports to be a return of fees and emoluments—E. Murray, marshal

United States for the district of Kentucky, from July 1, 1875, to January 1, 1876, and of moneys paid out by him during the same period for the services of his deputies, and for his office expenses.

Q. Is it one of the usual blanks for that service?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What ought this paper to contain?

A. It ought to show the marshal's net earnings, and his gross earnings as well.

Q. Is the marshal required to make oath to this return?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he do so?

A. (Inspecting the paper.) It appears that he did.

Q. What is the form of the oath?

A. "I, Eli H. Murray, marshal of the United States"——

Q. In this statement you find the fees of the various deputies, do you not?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you see any case in which they exceed the amount of $1,500?

A. No, sir.

Q. I see that the first item is, "Paid Deputy John Wyatt for services, $1,500."

A. He did the largest business.

Q. Then follow the fees of the other deputies.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That is the aggregate of the deputies' accounts?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, what is the duty of the marshal in regard to the accounts of those deputies which, as you say, were signed in blank?

A. Those were not the accounts of the deputies. Those were commissioners' warrants. They would not appear here at all.

Q. Look at the paper I now hand you and state what it is.

A. It is General Murray's fee-bill from July 1, 1875, to March 1, 1876.

Q. These are the fees in the aggregate, which should have appeared in this or in some of the emolument returns, are they not?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You have made a number of memoranda on the margin of the bill. I will read one of these bills:

United States of America to Eli H. Murray, Dr.

To executing warrant, per self, issued June 1, by W. A. Merriwether, commissioner, chg. viol. int. rev. laws	$2 00
To ex. spa. on H. Diven	50
To att. on com'r per R. Brent	2 00
To discharging	50
Total	5 00

On the margin of this I find the following memorandum: "Warrants all executed by Henry Diven. No affidavit drawn. No oath. Not true." Please state what you found out in reference to that particular account.

A. Well, as would appear from this memorandum on the margin in my handwriting, which is the only evidence I have got and the only data from which I can speak, for I do not remember a single thing about it, it cost the Government $5, and the man was discharged.

Q. How much of that account do you find to be correct, and how much fictitious?

A. I guess the whole of it was fictitious.

Q. That memorandum is in your handwriting?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. At the time you made that memorandum you knew that all that you set forth there was true?

A. Yes.

Q. And you stated in your memorandum, in your own handwriting, that that account was not true?

A. Yes.

Q. Is that a specimen of all the accounts you examined in Marshal Murray's office?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. All through this paper, which embraces a good many pages, I find similar marginal notes, which you have made in regard to these accounts.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Those memoranda were designed to point the items in these cases that were fictitious?

A. I suppose so. The arrests might have been made. It was one of those sham cases all the way through.

Q. All the items on this page seem to be of the same kind, mere fictitious prosecutions for the purpose of making fees?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the fees were right up to the limit of the law, as if the services had been actually performed?

A. Yes, sir. There is one account that seems to be straight.

Q. Did Marshal Murray deny the truth of the statement that these charges were fictitious when you called his attention to them?

A. I am not sure about calling his attention to those. I called his attention to the statement of Mr. Diven, and showed it to him.

Q. That statement, I presume, is based upon the details which appear in that fee-bill before you?

A. Yes, sir. I called Marshal Murray's attention to the statement of Diven, and he denounced Diven as going back on him, &c.; but I can not remember whether I ever showed this account to him or not.

Q. You are certain, though, that you showed him Diven's statement.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he deny the truth of any of the statements made by Diven, so far as you now remember?

A. He admitted the cases, but he denied that they were gotten up for the express purpose of making fees. He admitted that the charges were made. I am not quite sure now, but I think you will find that he paid back to the Government $700 or $800 of these charges.

Q. In subsequent returns?

A. Yes, sir; in settling up his accounts. I think I furnished the Treasury with such information as to his accounts that he refunded that amount. I am not positive now, but I think so. Results were what I was after in these cases. I made few records.

Q. What was the result generally of the investigation you made into the administration of the marshal's office?

A. Well, I came to the conclusion that he was totally unfit for the place; that there were illegal charges made by his deputies, by himself especially in the McCord case, for which I had the original warrant. He tried to explain it, but his explanation was unsatisfactory. I had his own handwriting, and he could not go back on it.

Q. Did he collect money from the Government for alleged services that were not performed, as shown in these different accounts?

A. I could not say as to that, because I think that before any settlement of his account was made these things were stopped.

Q. Did he file accounts against the Government for services that were not performed?

A. He had filed accounts for services.

Q. Accounts for services which were never performed, charges which were disallowed?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You said something about his resignation. How was that brought about?

A. Well, he took up that paper, and was disposed to make a fight anyway. He had strong friends, strong backing. He went to see General Grant and used every effort to sustain himself, but failed, and a letter was written by the Attorney-General requesting his resignation, and he came up and resigned. The letter was not recorded and the matter was dropped.

Q. Do you mean that Attorney-General Taft's letter was not placed on file?

A. It was not.

Q. So far as you know it is not now in the files of the Department?

A. I am quite sure it never was filed. The whole thing dropped.

Q. Did you see that letter which the Attorney-General addressed to Marshal Murray?

A. No; I can not say that I did. The Attorney-General told me that he had written him, asking him to resign.

Q. Did he state the reasons for asking Murray to resign?

A. Oh, yes; it was on this account entirely—on account of the statement of Diven.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Murray responded to that letter in writing or not?

A. I am quite certain that he did not. He came up in person.

Q. He came up and saw the President?

A. No; he had seen the President before that. He told me himself he had been to see the President about the matter.

Q. State whether he at first declined to resign.

A. He declined to resign until that letter of the Attorney-General was written. Then he came up and resigned.

Q. Did he demand an investigation before resigning?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did he file any affidavit of his own in the Department denying Diven's charges?

A. If he did I never saw it.

Q. Did he tell you himself that he was prepared to meet those charges and disprove them?

A. No, sir; not to my recollection.

Q. He knew Diven's statement and its contents, did he not?

A. Certainly. He saw that very paper.

Mr. FYAN. After these charges were made, the case was referred to the United States attorney, was it not?

The WITNESS. What is the date of this letter?

Mr. FYAN. July 22, 1876.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. One case here is the Rinaldo case. Did you investigate that?

A. I do not remember that case specially.

Q. You have a more definite recollection of the McCord case than of any other?

A. Yes; for the reason that that return was entirely in Mr. Murray's own handwriting.

Q. The United States attorney makes this remark about that: "The commissioner had directed Hackett to take his prisoner to Louisville, which he did. When here a warrant was issued by United States Commissioner Merriwether, and McCord's case was examined. The examination being through, Hackett applied to the marshal for the expenses which he had incurred in the arrest and transportation of the prisoner from Livermore to Louisville. The marshal says that the only way left to him to reimburse the postmaster was to adopt his act in the making of the arrest, and to charge the Government the same fees which would have been charged if the warrant had been in the hands of Hackett when he made the arrest." Did he charge the Government the same fees?

A. He amended the account so as to charge only $26.60. He did that after the newspaper article appeared and before I saw him.

Q. Did you see Hackett?

A. No, sir.

Q. You did not take Hackett's evidence?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you take the evidence of any of these men?

A. Yes, sir; there appear to be the evidence of Brent and of some other person who appeared before the commissioner, and whose name was in the account.

Q. Were they charged for constructive mileage?

A. No, sir.

Q. Were they charged $2 for the attendance of bailiffs before the commissioner; what specific false charge is there which General Murray made which you now recollect?

A. The McCord case.

Q. That was corrected, you say, before you got out there, and you assume that it was corrected because of this newspaper publication; have you any knowledge of that, or is it a mere assumption of yours that his attention was called to that account by that publication in a newspaper?

A. I can not say as to that.

Q. You took no evidence in the McCord case?

A. No, sir.

Q. He said in this case that Hackett had transported the men, and that there was $30 coming to him, and that the only way he could get it was by putting in a claim against the Government, and he did put in this claim for $26.60?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now what other charge is there?

A. I don't make any charge at all.

Q. In any of these cases did you examine anybody?

A. Oh, yes; I examined a number of people. I became satisfied that the statement made by Henry Diven was true.

Q. What were your sources of information; just the declaration of which you have spoken as to the integrity of Diven?

A. No, sir; I had the statement of persons that he brought to me at the time.

Q. Who were they?

A. That I do not remember.

Q. Were there affidavits?

A. There appear to be some affidavits of persons who were in attendance before the commissioner.

Q. Show me some of them.

A. I have no charges whatever to make against any one.

Q. Did you read over this letter of the United States attorney yesterday?

A. One of them I read.

Q. In this letter Mr. Wharton says: "Another charge I hear will be made against the marshal is that in his emolument returns he transfers fees made by one deputy, whose fees exceed the amount he is allowed to return, to the account of another deputy who has not made the full amount he can be paid under the statute. I have also examined this charge and find that the above was the practice in this district until 1872, when it was ordered to be discontinued by the judge, and that no such accounts have been presented since that day." Did you investigate that question?

A. I think I did.

Q. Is that true or not?

A. I saw a number of deputies, including Mr. Diven, who stated to me that he had signed blank vouchers up to that time; that he was in the habit of signing blank vouchers.

Q. Did you bring that to Mr. Wharton's attention?

A. Yes, I think I did; I am not positive about it. This investigation was made, as I remember it—in the first instance the papers were referred to Mr. Wharton, and then Mr. WHITE was not satisfied, and——

Q. What I want to call your attention to is the fact that Mr. Wharton says that this practice was discontinued since 1872.

A. Well, I do not think it was; I am quite sure it was not.

The CHAIRMAN. State substantially what took place between you and district attorney Wharton in regard to Marshal Murray.

A. It is difficult for me to remember now. I can not remember; but I had a number of conversations with Mr. Wharton on this subject, both in Louisville and Washington, and he admitted that the charges made by Diven were substantially correct. He admitted that there was a good case against Murray, and he always admitted it up to the last interview I had with him.

Q. When was that?

A. Certainly within two years, I think. When Mr. Hayes came in as President there was a strong effort made to retain Wharton and Murray. Mr. Wharton told me that he would not have his name go into the Senate with Murray's, and he always stated to me that there was a good case against Murray.

Q. At the time you were in Louisville did you see him or confer with him in reference to Mr. Murray's prosecution?

A. I do not remember as to that. We made the whole statement and the whole matter before Judge Ballard. Mr. Wharton was with me.

Q. Who was present when the matter was laid before Judge Ballard?

A. There was Mr. Wharton, the judge himself, and, I am almost positive, Mr. Murray. I won't say positively that he was present, but I am almost sure of it.

Q. Did the judge read over Mr. Diven's affidavit as you have presented it here, or did you acquaint him with its contents?

A. I acquainted him with its contents, and I think he read it over.

Q. Did he say whether those statements were true or false?

A. Oh, no. As I recollect now, he defended the practice of the marshal in bringing the prisoner to Louisville.

Q. Did he defend the practice of the marshal in charging fees for services that were not rendered?

A. No; I think not.

Mr. FYAN. He did not remark that they were incorrect?

The WITNESS. No; the judge rather defended Murray all the way through.

The CHAIRMAN. He was a friend of Murray's?

The WITNESS. They were all friends together.

Q. Did Murray make any statement to the judge as to the truth or falsity of the statement in the affidavit of Diven?

A. I do not remember. I am not sure that Mr. Murray was present. I think he was, but I am not sure. I think Mr. Murray did what many of the marshals were doing at the same time probably.

Q. He thought he was entitled to those fees, this $6,000 a year?

A. I do not believe that Murray personally had anything to do with making up the accounts.

Q. Did he give his personal attention to the duties of the office?

A. I think he was in and out of the office every day, but Farley ran the office.

Q. Do you know John H. Ward, of Kentucky?

A. I do not.

Q. You did not meet him at all while you were there?

A. Not that I know of. I might have met him.

Q. Did you know Walter Evans, now Commissioner of Internal Revenue, at that time?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you meet him at Louisville at the time you were there making this investigation?

A. I think I did; I am not sure. I do not remember—yes. He was unfriendly to Murray.

Q. Can you recall whether you brought these charges to his attention or not?

A. No; I can not remember. It appears to me that I have a faint recollection of his mixing in it some way.

Q. During your time of service, did you make examination into the accounts of other marshals in other States?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What States?

A. In the western district of Virginia.

Q. Did you file a report of those investigations in the Department?

A. I do not remember whether I did or not. If I did, it is there. I never went into details myself personally. I would go to the district and would get the witnesses, and would have a stenographer and examine into the office. There must be a report of my investigation in Virginia, I should say, but I am not certain.

Q. Was it not your practice to make written reports of your investigations?

A. No, sir; it was not my practice to make written reports.

Q. You gathered all the memoranda you had, and brought the matter verbally to the attention of the Attorney-General?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was the result of your examinations in the western district of Virginia?

A. The marshal and the clerk of the court resigned.

Q. Who was the marshal?

A. Mr. Gray. I do not remember his first name.

Q. What is the name of the clerk of the court?

A. I do not remember.

Mr. FYAN. What year was this?

A. About 1877.

The CHAIRMAN. What place was that court held?

A. At Danville and at Harrisonburgh.

Q. Where did the clerk reside?

A. At Danville.

Q. What were the nature of the charges which you investigated?

A. It was similar to the Kentucky business. That is, there would be trumped-up charges against citizens all through that part of the country for illicit distilling, and they would be brought down to Danville before this clerk, who was a commissioner, and there was collusion all round of the biggest kind, large amounts of money squandered. Gray had been marshal, I think, for about eight years. The district attorney defended him. Lurtz was his name.

Q. Did he go out too?

A. No; we could not move him. He had power to keep himself in. We could not get him out.

Q. Did you find that he was in collusion with the others?

A. I thought so. I have got no evidence of it now.

Q. But that was part of the result of your investigation?

A. The result of my investigation was that the whole district was corrupt all the way through, and I endeavored to get all those officials out, and succeeded in getting the marshal out, and the judge removed the clerk. He used to charge term after term for affidavits before the commissioner, although he never drew the affidavits nor filed them.

Q. Do you recollect whether you filed a written report of the result of that investigation?

A. I do not.

Q. If you did, that report will give the matter more in detail than you have given it here?

A. Yes, sir. I think Sim Newcomb filed a report on that matter, but I am not certain.

Q. Who was he?

A. He was employed in the Department of Justice at the time. I think he had more of the details of this investigation, and probably filed a report, but I am not sure as to that. The marshal died, and we dropped the matter. We intended to prosecute it, but he died, and it was dropped.

(Examination suspended.)

Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 5, 1884.

JOHN M. HARLAN appeared and was examined as follows:

By Mr. WILSON:

Q. Please state your age and occupation.

A. I am 50 years of age. I am one of the justices of the Supreme Court.

Q. Were you acquainted with Gov. Eli H. Murray, now of Utah, but who formerly was United States marshal for Kentucky in 1876?

A. I have known him from early in the year 1861 to the present time.

Q. Did you act or advise with him as counsel in reference to a publication that was made in the Louisville Argus and some charges contained in it in 1876 in any way? If so, please state what action was had in reference to those matters.

A. I was his legal adviser while a member of the bar of Louisville, Ky., in reference to certain charges made against him touching fees in his office as marshal of the United States for Kentucky.

Q. Please examine the paper shown you, which is called in these proceedings the "Diven statement," and say whether that paper was known to you in 1876; whether you saw it or had any information of that paper being made in 1876.

A. (After inspecting the paper.) I have now no recollection of having seen this paper, nor can I recall particularly what papers I did see while I was the adviser of General Murray. I can only state generally that I saw all, I suppose, that was published in the papers of Louisville at or about that time.

Q. Was your attention called during that year, or at any time, to any charges against Marshal Murray except this publication in the Argus?

A. Well, it is difficult for me now to say, but my best impression is that my attention was not called to any charges except those published in the Argus, unless there were charges embodied in a memorandum which was furnished me by Attorney-General Taft while I was in Washington in the summer of 1876.

Q. I will ask you if you had an interview, in company with Marshal Murray, or without him, in Washington in 1876, with Attorney-General Taft in reference to whether any charges had been filed in the Department of Justice against Marshal Murray; and, if so, what information you obtained on that subject.

A. I came to Washington during the summer of 1876 as the legal adviser of General Murray for the purpose of seeing the Attorney-General touching the charges which had been made in the public prints affecting his conduct as marshal for the State of Kentucky. I did see the Attorney-General in company with General Murray, and also had conversations with him when General Murray was not present. I said to the Attorney-General that I had come to Washington for the purpose of ascertaining what charges there were, if any, which were being entertained by the Department of Justice in reference to General Murray; that he was here in Washington for the purpose of meeting any charges, and desired the fullest possible investigation of each and all of them, with an opportunity to cross-examine any witnesses who might be introduced against him. During our conversation the subject of the resignation of General Murray as marshal was alluded to.

I do not distinctly remember when I first heard of the request, coming from the Department of Justice, that General Murray should resign his office, but I do remember saying to Attorney-General Taft that General Murray was not specially anxious to retain his position, and certainly would not stand in the way if his resignation was desired upon political grounds; but that he was unwilling to vacate the office, and his friends were unwilling that he should vacate it, if it was understood that the Department of Justice had any charges to make against him affecting his integrity as an officer or as a man. The Attorney-General replied in substance that he did not doubt the integrity of General Murray, and had no charges to make affecting his integrity.

I was aware before I came to Washington that an agent of the Department had been to Louisville for the purpose of looking into the condition of General Murray's office, and therefore asked the Attorney-General whether that agent had made any report to him. He replied that no report had been made, and that none would be made; that the agent had brought back with him some memoranda, indicating certain items in the accounts of General Murray, which in the judgment of the agent were not authorized by law. The Attorney-General remarked that he was inclined to agree with the agent as to some of those items, although he had not very carefully examined them. I said to him that although no report had been made General Murray was unwilling to rest under the imputation of making charges that were not authorized by law, and I would be glad to see that memoranda, or have a memorandum furnished me indicating substantially the items in General Murray's accounts to which the agent objected. He said if I would call the next day he would fuanish me with the desired information. I did call, and was furnished with a memoranda, containing, as I now remember, four or five or half a dozen items.

I do not now recall what they were, but I am sure that they did not exceed that number. I took that memorandum and examined such of the provisions of the statute as seemed to me to bear upon the items, and had subsequent conversations with the Attorney-General, mainly for the purpose of ascertaining exactly what, in his judgment, were the legal grounds of objection to them. I can only state now as my recollection, that I was satisfied upon examination of the provisions of the statute that there was not exceeding one of the items that was, perhaps, not strictly in accordance with the law, or about which there ought to be any serious dispute. The Attorney-General adhered to his views as to some of the items, but reiterated to me the expression of his confidence in the integrity of General Murray, and repeated the statement that no report had been made by the Department agent, and that none would be made. I said to him before leaving that if the administration, or the Department of Justice, desired General Murray to retire from the office for any political reasons there would be no obstacle thrown in the way. Being satisfied that the Department did not impugn his integrity as an officer or as a man, and being further satisfied that it was desired by some men in power that he should vacate the office, I said to the Attorney-General that in the course of a few months General Murray would take pleasure in sending on his resignation; which he did.

I suppose, Mr. Chairman, it would be fair and just to all concerned for me further to say that upon my return to Louisville I exhibited to Judge Ballard, then district judge for the State of Kentucky, now dead, the memorandum of differences between the Department of Justice and General Murray—these items to which I have referred. I went over them with him particularly, as he was the judge of the court, who felt, necessarily, some concern about such matters. The result of that examination by him was that in his judgment the charges of the marshal were correct.

I believe that is all that I know bearing upon that part of the controversy, unless it be that upon my return to Louisville, General Murray having made up his mind to send his resignation shortly thereafter, determined, upon consultation with me, to look over his accounts before he retired and see what items there were about which any possible doubt could exist. I know it was his purpose, and such was my advice to him, that under all the circumstances of the case and in view of the trouble which often comes upon officials and their securities years after they have retired from office, to resolve any doubt which he had as to any item in favor of the Government and close it up, that there could be no further complaint or just ground of censure. And I know that before he resigned, some time in the summer of 1876, he did make a remission to the Government of $700 or $800, intending to cover every possible item about which there could be any complaint. I do not now remember anything else about the matter.

Q. In the interview with the Attorney-General in regard to the items which he furnished you, was there any intimation of any kind that Marshal Murray had made any improper charges knowingly in his accounts?

A. The Attorney-General was clear and explicit in disclaiming any belief on his part that General Murray had knowingly made any improper charges. Had he not been explicit upon that point the resignation of General Murray would not have been sent to him.

Q. Was the Diven statement mentioned, or did you know at that time that they had a Diven statement?

A. I do not recall any special paper; I only remember that no papers were exhibited to me in the Department of Justice when I was here except a memorandum furnished from the items which had been brought from Louisville to the Department of Justice.

Q. Did the memorandum or statement to which your attention was called embrace any charges of malpractice or malfeasance in office in any way?

A. There was nothing on the memorandum furnished me except figures and such words as would indicate the nature of the charge that was made against the Government.

Q. The Diven statement embraces allegations that Governor Murray had charged for guards which he knew were not used, and that he had made various other charges and instituted prosecutions for fees and had men taken from the remote mountain districts before commissioners at Louisville, past nearer commissioners, and had had witnesses paid that he knew had not attended. Was your attention called to any such things as those by the Attorney-General at that interview?

A. I do not remember that it was. I do remember in a general sort of way that one of the charges made by this agent of the Department was that with reference to one or two cases charges had been made for guards which were not furnished, but to what case he referred I do not now remember.

Q. Did the Attorney-General, or the memorandum, indicate to you that anybody claimed that General Murray knew that the guards had not been furnished?

A. Certainly the memorandum furnished me did not contain any such intimation, and nothing was said by the Attorney-General, as I have already indicated, that showed that the Attorney-General supposed that General Murray had intentionally made any wrong charge.

Q. Did you know Mr. J. L. Farley, who was the chief deputy of General Murray at that time?

A. Very well.

Q. What is his reputation, if you know, as a man of integrity?

A. I have known Mr. Farley for a great many years. There is no man of better standing for integrity than Mr. Farley.

Q. Did you know and have you known the character and standing of General Murray in the community in Kentucky in which he lived at that time and for many years and in the Army? If so, will you state what it was?

A. I have known the general standing of Governor Murray in Kentucky more than twenty years. As a practitioner in the Federal court at Louisville I was often thrown in contact with him. I will say, generally, that there is no man in Kentucky for whose integrity, both as an officer and as a man, the people of that State without distinction of party would more readily vouch than for him. I know of no man in Kentucky of better standing there, according to the estimate placed upon him by the people generally, than Murray. He did, of course, in the discharge of the duties of his office during the period while there was a great deal of disorder in Kentucky, incur the enmity of some; but beyond that I take it that there are very few people in the State who would question his integrity.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was one of the items to which your attention was called in relation to fees in the case of the United States vs. Mat. McCord?

A. I am not sure that I recall names. There is one item in the memorandum that I recall a little more distinctly than any other; it was an item in reference to a charge made for fees in connection with the arrest of some man, I think an ex-postmaster in the lower part of the State.

Q. At Livermore?

A. Yes; I think so. I rather think that was embraced in the items.

Q. Do you remember any other matter that was embraced in the memorandum?

A. I do not, with certainty, though I have an impression—I can only give that—that there was in the list something in connection with guards said to have been furnished to prisoners brought from Lexington, Ky., to Louisville, men who were indicted for some offense in connection with elections. I perhaps recollect that particularly from the fact that I was the special counsel for the Government in the prosecution of those cases.

Q. Was there anything about the attendance of R. Brent and Cassin and Crittenden before the commissioner as deputy marshals?

A. I do not certainly recall them, though those names are familiar. I knew young Cassin, about the Federal court there.

Q. What position did he hold?

A. I am not sure about that. It was a good long while ago; it was some subordinate position about the building.

Q. Did you know Mr. R. Brent?

A. I might say that I recall his face, as at the time I knew everybody about the Federal building.

Q. "D. C." is placed after his name. What position did he hold? I suppose he was a deputy clerk?

A. I think I do recall him.

Q. Did you know Henry Diven?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. He seems to have been a deputy marshal there for nine years.

A. He was a deputy marshal for a number of years.

Q. Previous to 1876 what was his character for truth and veracity in the neighborhood in which he lived?

A. In the neighborhood in which he lived?

Q. Yes; in Louisville.

A. I knew him only in a general way as a deputy marshal, and I don't know that I ever heard any discussion about it one way or the other until those differences arose there at Louisville in connection with the marshal.

Q. Had you previous to that ever heard anything to his discredit?

A. I think not.

Q. You knew he was a deputy marshal there?

A. Yes.

Q. You saw him frequently about the courts?

A. Yes; I saw him about the court building very often, and knew of no change in his position there until he was discharged by General Murray.

Q. Do you know whether he enjoyed the confidence of the bar and of the court during his connection with it?

A. I can only say that up to this disturbance I never heard anything one way or the other about him in that regard; and probably it is a fair answer to your question to say that after that he did not enjoy the confidence of all. To what extent I do not know; my intercourse with him was purely official; I only know that after Mr. O'Neill was appointed marshal I was in court one day when the judge of the court made an order, which was announced, reciting that Diven was not a proper person to be a marshal, and removed him.

Q. That was on the motion of Marshal Murray?

A. I do not know.

Mr. STEWART. Is that a question or statement?

The CHAIRMAN. I am asking the question.

The WITNESS. I do not know anything on that subject. The first that I knew of it was the announcement in court. If it would be proper for me to state it, I can tell you the estimate in which the district judge, Judge Ballard, held him.

Q. You may state that. I do not know what estimate anybody had of him; I am asking for information.

A. Frequently after the troubles commenced I heard Judge Ballard say that he had entirely lost confidence in him as an officer and a man. But I ought to say that I have no personal knowledge of Mr. Diven's habits and ways other than as I would see him backwards and forwards about the building.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Did Judge Ballard make any explanation in connection with his statements about Diven?

A. I can only answer generally that he did. I can tell you what he said if you desire it, as far as I remember it.

Q. I suppose that would illustrate his view more definitely.

A. Well, Judge Ballard came to the conclusion, at least I heard him so say, that Diven's conduct in and about these charges against General Murray was influenced by very bad motives on his part; that he had become enraged because of his discharge from his position as deputy, and that he set out for the purpose of seeking his revenge upon the marshal. Judge Ballard had the highest confidence, perhaps I should say in that connection, in the integrity of General Murray, and perhaps did not regard with patience the assaults made upon him. I never heard Judge Ballard say anything in reference to Mr. Diven except in connection with his conduct arising out of these charges.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You never heard anything to his discredit except as you have stated?

A. No; I never heard anything about him one way or the other except in connection with this matter.

Q. Are you acquainted with Representative JOHN D. WHITE, of Kentucky?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What is his reputation in that State for truth and veracity?

Mr. STEWART. I don't know that I ought to object to that question, but I do not think it is proper.

The CHAIRMAN. He has been charged with having lied here, and I think it would be well to protect him, as he is a member of the House.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I think as a member of the House his reputation ought to carry the presumption that it is above suspicion. It has been assailed only incidentally by Governor Murray. If Mr. WHITE wishes to defend himself against that assault, let him seek the opportunity. I do not think the committee need to follow it down.

Mr. STEWART. I think it is quite improper. It is charge against charge. Mr. WHITE has charged Governor Murray with certain acts of malfeasance in office, and Governor Murray repels the charge and says it is false. I don't think that lays a foundation for such a question.

The CHAIRMAN. I have no objection to that view. Mr. WHITE has not been apprised, so far as I know, of these charges of Governor Murray, unless he has seen them in the papers.

Mr. STEWART. Well, they make a fair offset against each other. Mr. WHITE charged Governor Murray openly with being a scoundrel.

Mr. WILSON. It was announced yesterday morning that Mr. WHITE would be here, and I expressed a desire that he should be here.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not think we can go into details as to the character of all our witnesses, or we shall never get through.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Did you understand from the conversation you had with the Attorney-General that a political necessity did exist for the retirement of General Murray from the office of marshal of Kentucky?

A. He did not say so.

Q. Did you draw it as a legitimate inference from what he did say that that was his view?

Mr. STEWART. I rather object to that form of inquiry. Judge Harlan can state whatever the Attorney-General said. That is proper.

The WITNESS. I have not the slightest objection to answering the question.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. He has stated in substance that he informed the Attorney-General that if a political necessity did exist, then Marshal Murray would tender his resignation.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Did you draw the inference from your conversation with the Attorney-General that that was the purpose or the desire of the Attorney-General?

A. I recall at this time very distinctly the conclusion that I reached upon my visit to Washington on that occasion. From what occurred here, added to what I had heard and believed before I came here, my conclusion was that there was a purpose, on political grounds, to get rid not only of General Murray but of Mr. Wharton, the late district attorney. I am entirely willing to state why I thought so, if the committee desire it.

Q. Civil service had not obtained to any extent at that time. But that office does not fall within the line of the civil-service rules?

A. No.

By Mr. WILLSON:

Q. You have been asked whether Henry Diven associated with the members of the bar. I will ask you whether he was of the social standing which made him an intimate, familiar associate in any way of the members of the bar or whether he was simply a baliff?

A. I have not meant to say that he associated with the members of the bar in any other way than as an ordinary deputy sheriff or deputy marshal would be brought in contact with the members of the bar in and about a court of justice.

Q. He was not a social acquaintance of any member of the bar, so far as you know?

A. No; not that I know of.

Q. When you talked with Judge Ballard did you find that he knew the facts of the Livermore case and the McCord case that you have been asked about?

A. Yes; I will say generally that he seemed to be informed of the facts connected with all the charges that were made. I do not recall one more than another; I preserved no papers in connection with the matter, and dismissed it from my mind long ago.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I see in Mr. George K. Chace's statement that he says a letter was written to Marshal Murray by Attorney-General Taft requesting his resignation; and he further says that it was on account of these charges in the Diven statement. Did you ever learn of a letter of that kind having been addressed to Marshal Murray; and, if so, was it shown to you?

A. The question recalls to my mind some facts which I had omitted in the opening statement. I am quite sure that I saw that letter requesting his resignation. My recollection is that it said in substance to General Murray that his resignation would be accepted; which I interpreted, as any one would interpret it, as a request to resign. Whether I saw that letter at Louisville or here I do not now recall, but in the course of the conversation with the Attorney-General, after he had expressly disclaimed any purpose to reflect upon the official or personal integrity of General Murray, I said to him in substance that "one difficulty in the way of his sending a resignation was the fact that you have suggested to him, that you desired his resignation." "I take it for granted," I said to him, "that this letter is on the files of your Department, and that hereafter, when you have retired from office and he has retired from office, your successor and others will find there such a letter, and it will be unexplained; and I see difficulty in the way of General Murray sending a letter of resignation so long as that letter is unrecalled." The Attorney-General said, very promptly, "Well, just consider it withdrawn." "But there it is on the files of your Department," said I. He replied, "Well, I will meet that difficulty; I will tear it out or have it torn out." I said that would be satisfactory.

Q. It does not appear in the papers anywhere that the Attorney-General did so, but I suppose he did withdraw it from the files?

A. Yes; I never saw it in the letter-books or files office, but I do not doubt that I saw the letter which was sent to General Murray.

Q. Did it state the reason for asking his resignation or saying that they would accept his resignation?

A. No, sir; my recollection is that there was no reason assigned at all.

Q. And that letter the Attorney-General stated that he would withdraw or tear from the files?

A. Yes, sir. Of course General Murray, and I naturally as his counsel, attached some consequence to the letter, even in that form, in view of the fact that an agent of the Department had been to Louisville; and that is why I came here as General Murray's counsel to know what the charges were and to meet them.

There is a matter that escaped my mind that I suppose it is proper I should state. I do not know what bearing it may have one way or the other. When General Murray's name was sent to the Senate as governor of Utah (the date I do not now recall), it was published in the papers that somebody had filed some charges before one of the committees of the Senate in reference to his conduct while he was marshal of the State of Kentucky, and I received a telegram from him requesting me to go to the Department of Justice—that was the substance of it—and inquire whether any charges had been made there against him as marshal or any report had been filed affecting him in any way. I did call at the Department of Justice to inquire whether any agent or officer of the Department had filed any report affecting General Murray's conduct as marshal for the State of Kentucky, and the response was that there was no such report on file.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Who was the Attorney-General then?

A. General Devens.

Q. What time was this?

A. I do not remember the date, but it was toward the close of Mr. Hayes's administration.

Q. That was Governor Murray's second nomination?

A. No; it was his first. I believe his name was first sent to the Senate for governor of Utah by President Hayes.

Q. Was not that in the early part of his administration?

A. I think not.

The CHAIRMAN (to Governor Murray). In what year were you nominated as governor of Utah?

Governor MURRAY. In 1880.

The WITNESS. That was the time. It was when his name was sent to the Senate that I made that inquiry for him. That is the only other fact I recall that seems to bear upon the matter in any way.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, appeared and was examined.

By Mr. WILSON:

Q. You were a member of the Kentucky bar, and residing in Covington, during the administration of General Murray as marshal of that State?

A. Yes, sir; during the whole time.

Q. Are you acquainted with his reputation in Kentucky as an officer and as a gentleman of integrity? If so, please state what it is and what it was in 1876.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Before the Speaker answers that question I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that it strikes me that we are going a little outside of the record.

The Chairman remarked that Governor Murray had put his character in issue.

Mr. WILSON said the reason he offered this evidence as to character was that, although these charges had gone out to the country, there was really no evidence of fact in the record to be answered, no testimony at first hand from any witness who knew of any improper act of Governor Murray while he was marshal of Kentucky—nothing but hearsay, and hearsay in the third degree.

After a brief discussion it was decided to hear the testimony.

A. I think I know what General Murray's reputation was in Kentucky at that time and what it is now. I think he stands as high as almost anybody in the State as a gentleman of integrity and veracity, officially and otherwise. When I say almost as high, I mean that perhaps he is not at the very highest in the estimation of some, but his reputation is as good as anybody's. Every man has some enemies, some people who will disparage him, of course.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Have you practiced law much in Louisville?

A. I am not able to say that I have practiced there very much, though I have practiced there frequently in the courts during the time Governor Murray was marshal and since.

Q. Are you acquainted with Henry Diven, who was one of the deputies in that court for nine years?

A. If I ever saw Mr. Diven more than once, to know him, I have forgotten it. I may have seen him, and probably did see him frequently about the court, but did not know who he was. On one occasion, I remember, a gentleman that I took to be Mr. Diven—and who perhaps told me his name at the time—came to talk to me about some charges that he had against General Murray; but this was after General Murray had resigned the office and while Mr. O'Neill was marshal.

Q. And you are not acquainted with him?

A. I am not acquainted with him at all, sir.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Washington, D. C., April 7, 1884.

SIR: Having learned that Mr. Justice Harlan and Mr. Speaker CARLISLE have testified before your committee in behalf of Governor Murray, and that with their testimony, in connection with Governor Murray's own statement, your committee proposes to close the investigation concerning the expenditures in Kentucky during Governor Murray's marshalship for that State; and, furthermore, having learned from yourself that the testimony of Governor Murray in his own behalf controverted statements made by me when summoned before your committee, therefore I respectfully suggest, if there remain any doubt in the minds of the members of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice as to the fact that there was collusion between G. C. Wharton and Eli H. Murray, late United States district attorney and marshal for the State of Kentucky, through a corrupt and oppressive system of their own choosing, by which numerous prosecutions were instituted for the most trivial violations of law, the arrested parties being taken unnecessarily long distances and subjected to great inconvenience and expense in order to make costs against the United States and increase the fees of the officers, that you summon the following-named persons to testify before your committee:

1. Mr. Samuel Crail, Louisville, Ky., who, being clerk of the United States court, should be able to exhibit the records of the court during Murray's and Wharton's term of office.
2. Hon. H. F. Finley, Williamsburg, Ky., who is judge fifteenth Kentucky judicial district.
3. Hon. C. B. Faris, United States commissioner, London, Ky.
4. Maj. A. T. Wood, United States commissioner, Mount Sterling, Ky.
5. Col. W. A. Bullitt, Louisville, Ky., late assistant United States district attorney, under G. C. Wharton, for Kentucky.
6. Hon. Alphonso Taft, ex-United States Attorney-General, through whom Wharton was removed and Murray permitted to resign on account of the investigation of their official conduct by G. K. Chase, general agent for the Department of Justice.
7. Mr. A. J. Auxier, Louisville, Ky., United States marshal for Kentucky, who could show the records of his office.
8. Col. John H. Ward, attorney at law, Louisville, Ky.
9. Hon. Samuel McKee, attorney at law, Louisville, Ky.
10. Hon. Walter Evans, attorney at law, Louisville, Ky., prior to his appointment as Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

I have the honor to subscribe myself, very respectfully,

JOHN D. WHITE,
Member of Congress from the Tenth Congressional District Kentucky.

Hon. WM. M. SPRINGER,
Chairman Committee on Expenditures in Department of Justice.

Mr. McMILLIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, if no one else desires to speak on the question I will ask for a vote, and I hope the bill may go to the Senate with the prestige of a unanimous vote in its favor. I now call for the previous question on the amendments and on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. CALKINS, to add at the end of section 1 the words "Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to pending cases," was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McMILLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DOCUMENTS RELATING TO CUSTOMS REVENUES, ETC.

Mr. SCALES. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back with the amendments of the Senate the joint resolution (H. Res. 193) to provide for printing certain documents relating to customs revenues and domestic exports for the use of Congress. The committee recommend concurrence in the amendments of the Senate. I will state briefly the effect of these amendments. The resolution as passed by the House provided for printing 4,200 copies of the proposed volume. The Senate has amended the resolution so as to provide for printing 4,700 copies. The resolution as passed by the House provided that fifty of these documents should be placed in the House library, fifty in the Senate library, fifty in the Congressional Library, and that fifty should be for the Ways and Means Committee. The Senate has provided that the whole number printed shall be for the use of the House and the Senate, except one hundred copies for the Finance Committee of the Senate and one hundred for the Ways and Means Committee of this House.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Line 2, strike out "2" and insert "7."
Line 5, strike out "Senate" and insert "said."
Line 8, after "exports," insert "of."
Line 4, section 2, strike out "1,000" and insert "1,500."
Strike out after "Senate," in line 19 down to and including "Library," where it occurs the second time in line 20.
Strike out "50" where it occurs the second time in line 20 and insert "100."
After "for," where it occurs the second time in line 20, and insert "the."
After "Committee," in line 21, insert "and 100 for the Senate Committee on Finance."

Mr. CALKINS. The statement of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] was not heard on this side of the House, and many of us do not know anything about this bill. I hope the gentleman will give us some explanation of it.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. Let the bill be read as proposed to be amended if it is not too long.

The joint resolution as amended by the Senate was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to print, for the use of Congress, 4,700 copies of Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 46, first session Forty-sixth Congress, with additional data, to be furnished by the compiler of said document, showing the imports for the fiscal years ended June 30, 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, and 1883, and a compilation of exports of the growth, produce, and manufacture of the United States from 1789 to 1883, inclusive (ninety-four years), in which the quantity, value, and value per unit of quantity of each article are given by fiscal years and decades; also the value exported to each country and value from each State, with other additional data, prepared by Charles H. Evans, of the Treasury Department.

SEC. 2. That the documents described in the foregoing section be stitched and bound as one volume; that 3,000 copies of the same be for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 copies for the use of the Senate, 100 for the Ways and Means Committee, and 100 for the Senate Committee on Finance.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the amendments of the Senate. Unless a separate vote is asked, the question will be put on the Senate amendments in gross.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. SCALES moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. SLOCUM. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of introducing the following resolution for action at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the consideration of the bill of the House 2228, to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine, and to encourage the American foreign trade, and that Saturday, April 26, be set apart for the consideration of the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CALKINS. I did not hear the resolution fully, and I ask that it be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If under this resolution on Saturday, April 26, this bill should be the unfinished business on that day, would the effect of this resolution be to carry it over and continue it as a special order?

The SPEAKER. This special order is limited under the resolution to one day only, and under the practice of the House it would not be continued the following day unless the previous question was ordered on the passage of the bill on that day, when it would come up next morning; but not otherwise.

Mr. DINGLEY. It will be finished in one day.

There was no objection, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SLOCUM moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEASE OF PREMISES FOR POST-OFFICES.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. I ask by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1508) to authorize the Postmaster-General to lease premises for use of post-offices of the first, second, and third classes.

This is a matter of great importance, and the Post-Office Department is now embarrassed for the want of such action. Under the law as it is it can not lease for a longer period than one year, which is a most expensive method.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill, reserving the right to object.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Postmaster-General may lease premises for use of post-offices of the first, second, and third classes, at a reasonable annual rental, to be paid quarterly; but no lease shall be made for a term exceeding ten years; and whenever any building or part of a building under lease becomes unfit for use as a post-office, no rent shall be paid until the same shall be put in a satisfactory condition for occupation as a post-office, or the lease may be canceled at the option of the Postmaster-General; and a lease shall cease and terminate whenever a post-office can be moved into a Government building.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to inquire whether that bill has been reported from any committee of this House?

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. It has been considered by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and that committee has reported a bill similar to the one now pending.

Mr. WELLER. I inquired whether this bill had been before that committee.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. This is a Senate bill lying on the Speaker's table, but an exactly similar bill has been reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads with this exception, that the bill reported from the House committee includes the District of Columbia, and now, on further reflection, it is believed the District of Columbia will be included under the Senate bill without express words to that effect.

Mr. WELLER. I must object.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his objection, as the Postmaster-General informs us without this action the Department will be seriously embarrassed in leasing these buildings for post-offices. As it is now, they are confined to only one year, and are compelled to fit the building up at their own expense. If they could lease for three or four years, the party who rented the building to the Government would put in the fixtures. In that way the Government would be saved very large expense. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. WELLER. I think I am warranted in insisting on my objection without explaining the reason for it.

READJUSTMENT OF POSTMASTERS' CLAIMS.

Mr. TILLMAN. By unanimous instruction of the Committee on Claims, I ask leave to offer the following resolution for present consideration:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the House of Representatives of the names of all postmasters of the third, fourth, and fifth classes who have had their claims readjusted at other than biennial periods under the acts of July 1, 1864, June 12, 1866, and March 3, 1883, with the amounts paid each, the post-office where each served, and the date when each readjustment and settlement was made.

Mr. MONEY. I object unless that resolution is referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to have the gentleman from Mississippi state some reason why this unanimous request of the Committee on Claims should be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. MONEY. I was unaware it was a report from the Committee on Claims, and therefore will withdraw my objection.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. TILLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 224) granting certain publications to the Cincinnati law library.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GREEN, for fifteen days, on account of a death in his family.

To Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee, for the remainder of this week, on account of sickness.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to the Committee on the Judiciary to have printed for the use of its members papers connected with House joint resolutions 198 and 199, proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States; and also with reference to House bill No. 2241, to provide for paying certain advances made to the United States by the States of Maryland and Virginia.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

The question was taken. The House divided; and there were—ayes 85, noes 6.

So (no further count being demanded) the morning hour was dispensed with.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills upon the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the unfinished business coming over from the last session of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3935) to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] who has had this matter in charge has been detained from the House, most of the time on account of sickness, for several days. I hope, therefore, that this bill will be passed over by consent without losing its place on the Calendar. I ask, also, that the same course may be taken with reference to the two succeeding bills, namely: the bill (H. R. 3937) for the relief of Willis N. Arnold, and the bill (H. R. 1477) to pay Hiram Johnson and other persons therein named the several sums of money therein specified, being the surplus of a military assessment paid by them and accounted for to the United States in excess of the amount required for the indemnity for which it was levied and collected.

Mr. THOMAS. I object.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I wish to know, Mr. Chairman, if it is now in order to move to amend the second section of that bill? I believe we had reached that section.

Mr. THOMAS. I withdraw the objection I made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the objection is withdrawn.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry——

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I renew the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending proposition, the Chair is informed, is the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], which has been modified.

Mr. McMILLIN. I hope there will be no objection to allowing the other two bills to which I have referred to be passed over informally.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, that order will be made with reference to the two succeeding bills.

REMOVAL OF CHARGES OF DESERTION.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3935), objection being made to the request to pass it over informally, and the Clerk will report the pending amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is that in order? I understood the gentleman from Wisconsin to object to the request made by the gentleman from Tennessee. Is it in order to object to the consideration of this bill now? I rose for that purpose, supposing it rested upon the objection of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin did not object to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. My reason for desiring its postponement is that my colleague [Judge GEDDES] who presented the bill is still absent sick.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is now too late to raise objection to the consideration of the bill. The gentleman on the left [Mr. THOMAS] withdrew the objection.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. My understanding was that the gentleman from Wisconsin renewed it; but before any action was taken I rose to object to its consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin objected to the postponement of the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I so understood.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending proposition will now be read.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would like to ask if it is not in order at this time before action is taken upon that proposition to object to the consideration of this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman raise a point of order as to its consideration?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Only a parliamentary inquiry as to whether it would be in order now to object to its consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would rule that this is unfinished business and now in order.

The first proposition is the amendment proposed to the first section by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], who accepted several other propositions which were incorporated in this amendment.

The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of the first section after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, in his discretion and upon satisfactory evidence, to relieve from the charge of desertion the following:

"First. Men charged with desertion who voluntarily returned to their command within thirty days and served honorably to the end of their term of service.

"Second. Men who deserted from hospital or from furlough given from a hospital while suffering from wounds, injuries, or disease received or contracted in the service and line of duty, and who on recovery returned voluntarily to the service and served honorably until discharged, or who died from such wounds, injury, or disease while so absent, and before the date of muster-out of their regiments.

"Third. Men who returned under the President's proclamation and served honorably until discharged.

"Fourth. Men who left the service without proper authority, and thereby became deserters, for the purpose of relieving their families, residing within the enemy's lines, from distress or want, and who returned voluntarily and served honorably until discharged.

"Fifth. Men who while awaiting exchange deserted from parol camp, or while on furlough from a parol camp or other authoritative source, and who voluntarily returned and served honorably until discharged.

"Sixth. Men who deserted from a furlough given by any authoritative source, and who during such absence died from wounds inflicted by the enemy or disease contracted in the service before the muster-out of their commands.

"Seventh. Men who deserted or left one command solely for the purpose of joining another and did join another command within thirty days thereafter and served until the end of the war and were honorably discharged, and who received no additional bounty under such second enlistment: Provided, That no soldier shall be entitled to the benefits of this act against whom more than one charge of desertion shall be proved: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy shall be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered to apply the provisions of this act to the cases of appointed or enlisted men of the Navy or Marine Corps who served in the late war."

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I believe, Mr. Chairman, if I am correct, that the gentleman who proposed this amendment used his time in debate in its favor, and nothing was said in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin for five minutes.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. There was a disposition on the part of our committee, on the day this bill came up before, to accept this amendment. That is, we thought it covered nearly all the ground. But during the intervening time we have discussed it in committee and have gone over the whole ground, and find that it does not cover a great number of cases which naturally and properly ought to be covered by this bill.

For example, I call attention to this. Suppose a soldier returns to his command within thirty-one days or thirty-two or thirty-five days, he is just as much entitled to the relief provided by this law as though it were thirty days or less. Nor does it provide for that large class of cases of men who left their command at the close of the war not waiting for the red-tape procedure. It is proposed to offer an amendment which will cover all these cases. I hope the pending amendment will be voted down. I yield for a moment to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL].

Mr. ROWELL. My experience is that whenever we attempt to go into details in legislation we always make a mistake and make work for a succeeding legislative body; and that the only way to succeed is to make general legislation.

The purpose of this bill is to permit the Secretary of War in all just and proper cases to restore soldiers to the rolls where there are charges of desertion against them; and it seems to me that the bill proposed covers all these cases. But it needs this limitation. There ought to be a tribunal to decide whether a case is a proper one or not. And the amendment that the committee proposes to offer is to put it into the discretion of the Secretary of War in all cases, so that where a soldier ought not to have his record corrected it will not be corrected. We ought to cover all cases of soldiers who served honorably whether they deserted and were out for thirty or for sixty days. If they went back into the Army and did good service they ought to have a good record. The soldiers who at the end of the war went home, not willing to remain as regulars in the Army beyond the day when their services were called for, ought not to have the record of desertion standing against them.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEELE. Does not the bill which has already passed this House provide for the class of men referred to by the gentleman from Illinois and every other class except where they have not served six months and where they re-enlisted in another regiment?

Mr. ROWELL. I think not. A bill was passed once before intended to cover these things, and by seeking to guard against improper restorations it proved to be of no effect and did not cover anything. I think that the bill which has already passed the House is a good one, but it neglected to provide for the men who had enlisted in other regiments than their own; it neglected to make the necessary provisions in a good many other respects, as I think you will find when you come to examine it. A more general bill is required, and it seems to me that you provide all of the guards necessary when you put it in the discretion of the Secretary of War to refuse to wipe out a record of desertion.

He then has the power in every case of bounty-jumping, in every case of improper desertion, in every case of returning at the close of the war for the purpose of being mustered out, in every case of a man who was not a good soldier—in all those cases he can refuse to wipe out the record. All I desire is that, now that the war is over, all the mismaking of records by bad officers, all the mistakes occasioned by ignorance shall be wiped out, and that every good soldier who did good service for the country shall be permitted to have a proper record.

Mr. STEELE. I wish to ask the gentleman, and shall yield him my time to answer the question, wherein this bill is different from the bill already passed, except in the points I have named? The bill which has been passed provides May 1 shall be the limit instead of May 22; the bill which has been passed has not the words "re-enlisted in another regiment;" and the bill that has passed provides that soldiers shall have served six months before they shall have any of the benefits of the bill at all. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois to say if these are not the only differences between the bill that has been passed and this bill.

Mr. ROWELL. I have not before me the bill to which the gentleman refers. I took notice of its provisions when it passed and I thought it too limited in a good many respects. One of them is the provision the gentleman refers to, that wherever a man enlisted in another regiment than his own he is excepted from the provisions of that bill; and where he failed to serve for six months he is excepted from the provisions of that bill.

Mr. STEELE. That is right.

Mr. MAGINNIS. And when he was a bounty-jumper.

Mr. ROWELL. Not necessarily when he was a bounty-jumper.

Mr. MAGINNIS. He would be a very funny mustering officer if he had mustered such a man in.

Mr. ROWELL, I do not think any mustering officer could be supposed to know every man out of four or five hundred thousand soldiers.

Mr. STEELE. The only differences between this bill and the one that was passed are what I have stated. When a man went home as early as the 1st of May, 1865, the bill provides that the charge of desertion may be removed from his record. The bill that has passed provides where soldiers have returned voluntarily and served until the close of the war the charge of desertion against them shall be removed.

It does not provide that where they have enlisted or deserted their regiment and then re-enlisted in another regiment the charge of desertion shall be removed from them. The bill of the House provides that men who re-enlisted and served for six months before the war closed shall receive all the benefits of the act. That is the only difference between this bill and the one that has already passed the House.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I shall always protest against the idea so often advanced on this floor that there was no difference between the men who entered the volunteer service; that they were all equally worthy. While the great majority of them were worthy, we know that there was a class of men who put on their country's uniform simply for the purpose of defrauding the Treasury.

The members of this House know that no man desires to be more liberal to the honorable and deserving soldier than I do; but I believe that any reward or any graciousness shown to the dishonorable soldier is an insult to the honorable soldier. I heard my diplomatic friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] say the other day that the difficulty with the bill which then passed this House was that it did not cover the case of a man who deserted the service and then re-enlisted; as he said, merely changed his military control.

Mr. RANDALL. I referred to the man who after he left one regiment enlisted in another, and the United States accepted his services as a member of that regiment, who then went into battle, endangered his life and received wounds, the scars of which he bears to this day; yet he stands on the rolls of the War Department as a deserter, and is debarred from ever having a hearing in order to obtain a pension. It was that man that I wanted to have protected.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. His desertion in that way was just as demoralizing as if he had deserted and gone home.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Just as much so. There was at that time an industry in this country called bounty-jumping; men enlisted in one regiment, deserted as soon as they could get the opportunity, enlisted in another regiment, and deserted again.

Mr. RANDALL. Such a man as that ought to have been shot.

Mr. MAGINNIS. But this bill provides for putting him on an equality with the deserving and honorable soldier. That is what I protest against.

Mr. WELLER. I would like to ask the gentleman this question, if I may: Does not this bill carefully provide against any favor to that class?

Mr. MAGINNIS. No, sir; that is just exactly where, in my judgment——

Mr. WELLER. I mean with the amendment.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I did not hear the amendment.

Mr. WELLER. With the amendment which has been proposed.

Mr. MAGINNIS. In fact, I do not think any amendment can provide against that.

Mr. WELLER. Would you bar out those who are worthy for the purpose of keeping out a few who are unworthy?

Mr. MAGINNIS. The number covered by this bill who are unworthy so far outnumber the few that are worthy that the proportion is all on the other side. It is a bounty-jumper's bill and ought to be referred back to the committee. I do not think the committee really intended to present such a bill as this is.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I move to strike out the last word. We have under discussion, it would seem, two bills: one that has already passed this House, and the one now before us, which it is proposed to pass. The question is whether anything will be gained by the passage of the pending bill.

It is hardly necessary for me to observe that deserters from the Army are not a favored class. The word "deserter" is a disreputable one, and whenever and wherever it is spoken, wherever it is borne on the rolls, it carries with it a certain stigma and disgrace. The gentleman from Montana who has just taken his seat [Mr. MAGINNIS] has voiced this almost universal sentiment which prevails not only with those who were in the military service but with those who remained in civil life as well.

But that disgrace and that stigma in thousands of cases is utterly undeserved. There is no man who more strongly reprobates the soldier who left his flag and his command for the purpose of deserting the service of his country than I do. I do not care where he served nor in what army he served, if he left his command for the purpose of deserting his comrades in arms and leaving them without his aid to the fortunes of war he deserves nothing but the stigma and disgrace he bears and is worthy of no mercy at our hands.

But there were thousands, nay tens of thousands, of men whose names to-day are borne upon the rolls of the Adjutant-General's Office as deserters who were never deserters in fact in that opprobrious sense in which we apply the term to men who left their colors. There were men who were left behind their commands because they were sick, and whom some blundering orderly wrote upon the rolls of the company as deserters. Men who were left on the wayside and were captured are carried on the rolls of the Army to-day as deserters. Men who sleep the everlasting sleep of death in the jungles of the Wilderness or upon the plains of the South are entered upon the rolls of the Army as deserters, and their children left behind them must bear the stigma attached to the memory of their fathers.

The bill which has already passed the House, and which came from the Committee on Military Affairs, upon which I have the honor to serve, I believe, as stated by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], does fairly cover every class excepting only that class who after leaving their own command for some reason or other enlisted in another command and served to the end of the war. I have in my mind a case in a county adjoining my own. I do not suppose there are three men in the county who know that the man to whom I refer is borne upon the rolls as a deserter. He is a man of high standing; but when a mere boy, having had an altercation with his captain, he left that command and immediately enlisted in another; he served honorably until discharged, enlisted again, and by merit and gallantry rose from the rank of private to that of a captain of cavalry. Being mustered out at the close of the war, after four years' of honorable and arduous service, he entered the regular Army and served there most honorably to the end of his term, when he was discharged with credit. Yet this man is borne upon the rolls as a deserter on account of that youthful indiscretion; and unless this stigma is removed his children after him must bear the disgrace.

The bill which has already passed this House grants no relief in such cases. I believe there should be such provision as this bill will make, by which men who after deserting enlisted in another command and served honorably and gallantly until the end of the war shall be segregated from those who deserted for the purpose of abandoning their comrades in arms and the service of their country.

I am therefore in favor of this bill. We can not recall the other bill to amend it; and the only manner in which we can reach the class of cases I have described is by passing this bill, properly guarded, so as to shut out every possibility of bounty-jumpers getting pensions or any other benefit, which should belong only to men who have served their country honorably.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. WOLFORD. I renew the amendment, Mr. Chairman. The substitute offered for this bill contains many good things; but it is too voluminous; and the original bill is a much better measure than gentlemen who are opposing it represent it to be. I apprehend that they are mistaken as to its purport.

We are all opposed to extending any favor to men who entered the Army with the intention of jumping the bounty. Such men ought not to receive any consideration anywhere. This bill as reported by the committee can never embrace men of such character, if I understand correctly its provisions.

Sir, some of the very best men who were ever in our Army are upon the rolls as deserters. The circumstances are such as to furnish palliation and excuse for them. I do not believe that a man who deliberately intended to desert could ever be among the best men of the Army; but I want to call attention to a few cases which have come within my observation.

There was a numerous class of men in our Army who became at some time in their service home-sick. The doctors have a technical name for this disease. I knew of numerous men who in consequence of what I conceived at the time to be the cruelty of their officers in not allowing them to go home to see their families for a few days actually died from home-sickness, so that the country lost the benefit of their services. Many men of this class—good men, noble-hearted men, brave men, but tender and kind, with love for father and mother and home and a longing desire to see them—did desert and go home. When they had once reached their homes and the longing had been satisfied—when they had seen their mothers, their fathers, their brothers, their sisters, their sweethearts—they were then ready to re-enter the service. These were good men. I have known some of them who came back to the Army and joined other regiments—regiments that happened to be under my command. Within my knowledge some of these men have done as noble and gallant fighting as any men ever did upon the face of God's green earth. They loved their country and were ready to die for it. But after they had returned to their homes, after they had satisfied their unconquerable longing to visit their relatives and friends, they were confronted with the difficulties of the position in which they had placed themselves. The question presented itself to them: "What shall I do? I am reported as a deserter. If I go back to my own company or regiment (and I have nothing against them) I shall be court-martialed as a deserter and shot, in order to maintain the discipline of the Army. I can do the country no good by being shot as a deserter." This is the way they reasoned. They may have reasoned wrongly; but influenced by reasoning of this kind and desiring to serve their country and if necessary die for it they joined other commands and fought until the end of the war.

This bill provides that before the charge of desertion shall be removed in any case the man must have an honorable discharge—a thing which no bounty-jumper could ever get. Gentlemen alarm themselves needlessly about bounty-jumpers. I say that a man who intentionally quit his command in order to jump the bounty never could get an honorable discharge if the officers of the Army did their duty, and the law presumes that they did.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. WOLFORD. I have only five minutes, and I am not going to be interrupted. The gentleman has made many speeches on this bill, while I have not said a word. I will state to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE]—he may answer it when he pleases; I am not going to be interrupted now—I will tell him that his bill, which I voted for because I would rather have a few bounty-jumpers included in its benefits than see a number of good men shut out, covers thousands of bounty-jumpers. But I will not stop to discuss that.

But there is another class of good men for whom provision should be made. Sometimes our confederate friends came into my native State, and they annoyed us a great deal; they did us a great deal of harm. I know that often sick men, men not able to march with their commands, were left behind. While commanding a division of cavalry I came across thousands of these men. They came to my command, and they came to my command because they could not get to their own command. The time had passed when they could get to their own command. But they wanted to fight and they wanted to die if necessary in the defense of their country. They came to my command and they joined some regiment in that command. Why, Mr. Chairman, I remember some men who came and joined a regiment from your own State of New York which was under my command, a most gallant regiment, and who fought with that regiment to the end of the war, and who were honorably discharged, many of them having been promoted for gallant conduct in the Army. Now do you mean to say that these men shall be cut off from the effects of the law when they could not return to their own command in time, and the only way they had of doing any good was by joining another command and fighting against the enemy? They may have been wrong in their judgment, they may have made a mistake, they may not have been altogether technically right, but their intention certainly was good, as was proved by the result. Their heart was right, their soul was right, everything going to make up an honorable and gallant soldier was theirs, and you would by failing to pass this bill just as it is cut off thousands of just such brave and honorable and true-hearted men. The number is not confined only to one or to two, but there are thousands of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WOLFORD. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for his courtesy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are thousands of men all over the country who served in our Army and who are just in that difficulty, and this legislation is to relieve them. It is right and proper that it should be done.

This war was like no other war that ever occurred in the history of the United States. It was no foreign war, it was a civil war; it was a war between brethren; it was a war which grew up out of a dreadful mistake. [Laughter.] I contend it was the biggest mistake ever made. [Laughter and applause.] It has now passed by and we all know it has proved to be one of the grandest jokes and biggest mistakes ever made by any party against the Government. [Laughter and applause.] Whether it was a mistake or not, there was fighting everywhere. The armies that were in the field were fighting armies, they fought from State to State and from county to county, and necessarily, in rapid movements, men were often cut off from their commands. Now, are you going to say by the bill of the gentleman from Indiana that these men shall be cut off although they fought to the close of the war? Are you going to cut off the men who joined other commands and fought gallantly and who were honorably discharged? I am not talking about bounty-jumpers; but even if some bounty-jumpers should happen to get through it is our duty to do this justice to the brave and true soldiers to whom already injustice has been done.

Let me say right here, Mr. Chairman, that it is recorded in that old book I have read since I was a boy that God Almighty himself would have saved Sodom and Gomorrah if only ten righteous men could have been found there. [Laughter and applause.] And I do believe if a few men who were bounty-jumpers were to get advantage of this bill that is no good reason why we should cut out the great number of good and true soldiers it will include. The good and gallant men whom it will provide for are like the people of Sodom and Gomorrah compared to the few bounty-jumpers it will cover. The majority of those whom it will reach are honest soldiers, who believed they were doing right, although they made a mistake in their judgment.

And there is another thing I regret to notice, but truth compels me to say it at this time. There was another thing which compelled men to desert. It was unfortunately true that every officer in the Army was not what he should have been, a father to his regiment and a father to his command. Officers would take men for trivial crimes and hang them up by their thumbs and disgracee them and would treat them with all manner of inhumanity. Thank God such officers were very few, but there were such officers. In such regiments it is not to be wondered at that men did desert. Could you blame them? They did not desert their country, they did not desert the flag of the Union, they did not desert the cause which they had sworn to support. No; all they did was to desert a tyrant who as an officer was placed over them. They deserted the command of an officer who was placed over them and who did not treat them with sympathy and kindness, and they went off to better quarters and joined other commands where they could receive some encouragement and some of the attentions to which they were entitled, and there they did battle for their country and fought gallantly. Many of these gallant men have died, and their widows and children have the right to demand of this Government that the names of these men shall be relieved from the injustice which has been put upon them of marking them as deserters. They fought for their country and did good service, and they have the right to ask the name of deserter shall be blotted out from their record. The man who made a mistake and absented himself from one command and went and joined another regiment and fought gallantly to the end of the war and died in the service should not have his widow and children suffering under the stigma that he was a deserter, but that charge should be blotted out of his record, and they should receive the relief to which they are entitled.

Are not these gentlemen who are making such a fuss about what this bill may do for bounty-jumpers a little mistaken in what they are doing? I am not pleading for bounty-jumpers; far from it. I plead for the honest soldiers of this country. I plead for the noble and gallant men who were ready to do their duty, to rush to the front, to die if need be for their country when the crash of war came. If in the endeavor to do them justice a few of these bounty jumpers should be benefited, I say let justice be done. If you can get in a good soldier and grant him relief, I say do not exclude him because the act of justice that you do to him might perhaps give some undeserved aid to the bounty-jumper. What, then, are you afraid of? There are no hostile forces abroad over your land. There are no sounds of battle in the air. There are no hostile navies on the ocean. We are in profound peace with the whole world.

You do not want to set an example, you say. You do not want to encourage bounty-jumpers and deserters. But you would never set an unworthy example by doing an act of justice to these gallant men, although in that act of justice you did aid a few of those who are not entitled to it. Wipe out the stain that your records bear against those men who fought for their country. A good name, Mr. Chairman, is better than riches——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, took the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. WOLFORD.

Mr. WOLFORD. I thank the honorable gentleman from Alabama. I have only a few words more to say, Mr. Chairman. It is said in the Bible that a good name is better than great riches.

We fear no evils from hostile forces now; but, oh, what would you take—and I put it to you all, you gallant soldiers, and I put it to my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], who has a record of honor, and one that not only honors him but his country—what would you take to have written against that honored name in the records of your country, the highest records of the whole world, the terrible word "Deserter?" No gold could tempt you. Just think for a moment of the thousands of gallant men against whom this country permits that dreadful word to be written. If they have a little child, a youth, a boy verging on manhood, a little babe in the arms, that stain rests upon them forever.

Would you allow your child—and we must do as we would have others do unto us—would you have that burning stain and disgrace written against the names of those little children whom you love?

I am not talking of pensions or back pay, though many of them ought to have that; I am talking now of a higher thing—the honor, the integrity, and the good name of man. There is no one among you who would have his name tarnished in that manner for all the world. The honor of a man is a costly thing, and shonld not be trifled with or tarnished.

Would you have the cold finger of scorn pointed at your children when they go their way through the world? Would you let the brand of infamy hang upon them forever? Why, then, are you unwilling to remove that burning shame from the records of these honorable, gallant men who rushed forward in the hour of our country's peril and danger when our good friends here all around me had us by the throats and were about to destroy us? [Laughter.] Would you have this stain to remain upon the records of these gallant, honorable men because the removal of it might also lift it from a few hundred that are unworthy and undeserving? Perhaps many of them did not think for a moment of what they were doing. Perhaps they were young, impulsive, knowing nothing about red-tape and records, never dreaming for a moment of the vile infamy that would blast their lives forever.

Do you want them dishonored? Would you have disgrace and infamy attach to them for all time? If you would perpetuate the infamy which attaches to their names, then refuse to pass this bill. I appeal to you gentlemen who would attach infamy to bounty-jumpers, will you also attach infamy to him who died upon the field of battle, so that his children shall bear the stigma of disgrace forever? Would you attach endless disgrace to these hundreds of one-legged or one-armed men, these gallant soldiers that can not draw a pension and are disabled from all pursuits whereby they can earn their own subsistence? They do not ask you for pensions. They would rather have a good name than the support which the pension would grant them. Will you attach shame and infamy to them because, forsooth, you might release some of these bounty-jumpers?

Mr. Chairman, you need not be afraid of relieving the bounty-jumpers. They can never be relieved. Infamy is theirs now. You can not brand them with any deeper shame than that with which they now walk abroad among their fellow-men. They know it when they get home. But there are all over this land thousands of men who periled their lives and their health for their country; there are thousands of widows and children upon whose innocent heads rest the stigma of disgrace.

Now, will this country in a state of profound peace, when there is no fear of battle, no danger of hostile forces, rise up and say, "We shall cover you with disgrace and infamy, and your children shall wear the stain and the brand through their lives; the finger of cruel scorn shall ever be pointed at them and we will never relieve you?" Is that the way for the great American nation to deal with its gallant soldiers, its noble defenders? Congress may say it is, but in the homes of the soldiers, in the communities where they are living and where they are known and respected among their neighbors, it will be said that you are doing them a wrong and that you should wipe out the disgrace. [Applause.]

Mr. CALKINS. I move to strike out the last word.

I desire to call the attention of the committee to one or two matters in reference to this subject in connection with the bill now under consideration. In the last Congress a bill was passed removing the charge of desertion against certain soldiers that had left their commands and were borne on the rolls as deserters or as absent without leave. That bill received a very careful consideration both in this end of the Capitol and in the other, and finally went to a committee of conference. The difficulty after that law was passed which was encountered in carrying it out was the construction which all the military courts and the judge-advocates-general have during the last seventy or eighty years given to the word "deserter;" so that when the law came to be construed by the Secretary of War it left the class of men who were intended to be benefited by the act in just as bad a condition as if the bill had not been passed.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The language was, "who did intentionally desert."

Mr. CALKINS. It is suggested to me the expression used was "intentional desertion.

Mr. VANCE. Does this bill remedy that?

Mr. CALKINS. I was going on to show that it does not. The other bill carried the words "intentional deserter" or "intentional desertion."

Mr. RYAN. And that destroyed it.

Mr. CALKINS. But that word "intentional" had very little to do, if anything, with the construction which the Secretary of War put upon the word "deserter." If any gentleman will take the trouble to look up his construction of the law, he will find the word "deserter" in the military law is a word bearing a technical construction, and I have my doubts whether, for that reason, any bill carrying these words in it, unless they are classified, will do any good to the soldiers that are intended to be benefited.

There are two or three classes of soldiers for whose benefit a law should be passed. As, for example, those men who left their commands after the war had practically closed. After the surrender of Johnston in North Carolina it was known to all of the men in the Army as well as to the officers that the war was about over and they construed for themselves the right to say that their time of service was over, and many of them went home. They were good soldiers, had served during the war many of them; they were brave men, many of them promoted for gallantry. I have in my mind several of such men who served with me in my regiment. There is another class of men who should be relieved.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is not that the most meritorious class of all?

Mr. CALKINS. There is another class just as meritorious: the class of men who fell by the wayside in the long marches and when the commands were moving hastily from one part of the country to another; and some orderly sergeant or lieutenant or captain in command of the company, not knowing where they were, not knowing what the effect would be hereafter, marked them as absent with leave. After a while, when the war closed, they had not caught up with their commands, and they were marked as deserters.

There is still another meritorious class: men captured in battle and taken to prison; and their commanding officers, not knowing where they were, marked those men as deserters and they are borne on the roll as deserters. Then there were some men absolutely killed in action, or wounded so badly that they afterwards died, that are marked as deserters.

All these men should be relieved. I think we are all practically of one mind on that subject. The only question is how to draw a bill such that the Secretary of War under the opinion of the Judge-Advocate-General, following a long line of precedents, would not so construe it as entirely to do away with its effect and meaning. I do not think the words "intentional desertion" in our last bill had anything to do with the construction the Secretary of War put upon it. His construction was founded upon the opinion given him by the Judge-Advocate-General, and the Judge-Advocate-General in construing the law discusses simply the term "deserter;" and he says a man can not be a deserter unless he intentionally deserts, and that has been the construction of the Department for seventy or eighty years.

Mr. VANCE. If a man is absent from his command without leave, and is so marked, is not that the ordinary acceptation of the term?

Mr. CALKINS. The ordinary construction of the War Department is that whenever a man is marked and borne on the roll as a deserter he is in fact a deserter, and no bill will relieve him unless you relieve by classes; unless you classify those men who left under certain circumstances and those who left under certain other circumstances, naming each class. I think that is the only kind of bill that will benefit these men.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Then would not the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] now pending cover the point which the gentleman is discussing?

Mr. CALKINS. Pretty nearly.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CURTIN. I know very well it would be quite improper to grant any relief to bounty-jumpers. I can not but think the number of that class is very much magnified in the discussion of this measure. The armies of the Government engaged in the war show on the roll a total of forty or fifty thousand over three million men. The desertions were less than 9 per cent., as stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] when this bill was formerly under discussion. The proportion of deserters from the armies of the Government in the war of 1812–'13 was much larger. The deserters from the Prussian army in the invasion of Austria in 1866 were three times that proportion; and the deserters from the German army in the invasion of France in the late war were more than twice that proportion. So that the number of desertions is not extraordinary considering the extent of territory over which the soldiers were fighting and their proximity to their homes.

It seems to me this bill very properly gives the Secretary of War the discretion to classify. There is no doubt he can distinguish between the real soldier who went home and who is intended to be the beneficiary of this bill, and the bounty-jumper who has been so reprobated, and so properly reprobated, on this floor.

As to the class of men called "bounty-jumpers," we in Pennsylvania had perhaps less experience with them than they had in other States. We were more remote from the class of men who were professional bounty-jumpers, who generally came from Canada and landed in States west of us or States nearer the borders. But we have in Pennsylvania more soldiers who are marked on the rolls as deserters than many States of the West have, for the reason that our Pennsylvania soldiers came to Washington with the Army of the West and of the Potomac, and when the war was over many of them went home, more perhaps in proportion than from some of the other States.

Mr. STEELE. Intending to come back and be mustered out?

Mr. CURTIN. They expected to come back and be mustered out. They went home and assisted in cutting the harvest, and many of them did come back. I have applied to the Department to wipe out that stain from the record of the soldiers of Pennsylvania, and I have some satisfaction in saying that among them all I have not come across a single bounty-jumper; not one of that class. The professional bounty-jumper had exhausted himself before that period of the war came on.

Now, with the bill which has already passed the House, and which covers the cases complained of by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], and with the classification proposed to this bill by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], and with the saving clause in the amendment just proposed, leaving to the Secretary of War a discretion in the matter, it seems to me that this bill can not be made more perfect to protect those who deserve protection and to place in the proper quarters the responsibility and the power of preventing those who are unworthy from receiving the bounty of the Government.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I now move that the committee rise for the purpose of obtaining an order from the House to limit debate upon this section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Before that is done I would like to have read the amendment now pending, so that we may know what amendment is pending to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of the first section after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, in his discretion and upon satisfactory evidence, to relieve from the charge of desertion the following:

"First. Men charged with desertion who voluntarily returned to their command within thirty days and served honorably to the end of their term of service.

"Second. Men who deserted from hospital or from furlough given from a hospital while suffering from wounds, injuries, or disease received or contracted in the service and line of duty, and who on recovery returned voluntarily to the service and served honorably until discharged, or who died from such wounds, injury, or disease while so absent, and before the date of muster-out of their regiments.

"Third. Men who returned under the President's proclamation and served honorably until discharged.

"Fourth. Men who left the service without proper authority, and thereby became deserters, for the purpose of relieving their families, residing within the enemy's lines, from distress or want, and who returned voluntarily and served honorably until discharged.

"Fifth. Men who while awaiting exchange deserted from parol camp, or while on furlough from a parol camp or other authoritative source, and who voluntarily returned and served honorably until discharged.

"Sixth. Men who deserted from a furlough given by any authoritative source, and who during such absence died from wounds inflicted by the enemy or disease contracted in the service before the muster-out of their commands, or who left their regiments after May 1, 1865.

"Seventh. Men who deserted or left one command solely for the purpose of joining another and did join another command within thirty days thereafter and served until the end of the war and were honorably discharged, and who received no additional bounty under such second enlistment: Provided, That no soldier shall be entitled to the benefits of this act against whom more than one charge of desertion shall be proved: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy shall be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered to apply the provisions of this act to the cases of appointed or enlisted men of the Navy or Marine Corps who served in the late war."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. A word or two before the committee rises.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I would like also to have read the amendment which has been sent up but not formally offered.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I desire to demand a division of the substitute.

Mr. COBB. One word on the amendment just read. I suggest that there should be an amendment to it to this effect: "Or who were in the act of returning to their commands and were prevented from so doing by being arrested by provost-marshals or otherwise." If the committee will permit me, I will say that there are cases of that kind in my district, of soldiers who went home temporarily with the intention of returning to their commands, and while in the act of returning were arrested.

Mr. CALKINS. In all those cases were they not court-martialed after they were taken back?

Mr. COBB. It was so near the close of the war that in many cases their regiments were disbanded before they could return.

Mr. CALKINS. In the cases where they were tried by court-martial, if an amendment of the kind suggested by my colleague [Mr. COBB] should prevail, it would have the effect of setting aside the findings of those courts-martial.

Mr. COBB. There are cases in my district——

Mr. CALKINS. I have no doubt there are cases in which such a course would be proper.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is proceeding only by unanimous consent, pending the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I will withhold the motion only for the purpose of having read the amendment which is proposed by the committee, but not yet offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2 by adding the following:
"Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not be applicable to any soldier who willfully deserted for the purpose of obtaining a bounty or other pecuniary reward by re-enlistment, and the granting of relief in each case shall be discretionary with the Secretary of War after an examination of the facts."

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3935) to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar resumes the consideration of the pending bill, all debate upon the first section of the bill and pending amendments be limited to fifteen minutes.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I hope the gentleman will say "ten minutes." We have had two days of solid debate on this bill, and it is time the debate should be ended.

Mr. LAIRD. If I rightly understand, the entire controversy is upon the amendment offered to the first section of the bill. I hope we shall be allowed at least fifteen minutes for debate; I think we ought to have twenty.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I can not accommodate all gentlemen; I must insist on my motion.

Mr. STEELE. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin by striking out "fifteen" and inserting "five."

Mr. WELLER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "five" and inserting "twenty."

Mr. WELLER'S amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. STEELE to the motion of Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, was agreed to; and the motion as amended was adopted.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3935) to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House debate on the first section of this bill and the pending amendments is limited to five minutes.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, how much of that time can I control?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized to control the whole of the five minutes.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I believe all members of the House agree that the charge of desertion should be removed in every case where it has been erroneously or unjustly or improperly made; that where any mistake has been committed in this respect the mistake should be corrected. But I think it important, Mr. Chairman, that we should not go beyond proper limits. We are making history; we are establishing precedents. Congress will not, I believe, undertake to enact that a man who intentionally deserted his command should be placed upon the same plane with the soldier who staid with his command, stood by his colors to the end. Such a precedent would be a very bad one and would tend to destroy all military discipline.

I think, however, Mr. Chairman, that the amendments offered to the bill before us by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana when it was last under consideration sufficiently guard it against abuses, while at the same time admitting all meritorious cases, and afford relief to every man against whom the charge of desertion has been erroneously or wrongfully made, but leaving the charge to stand, as it ought to stand, where men deliberately deserted their comrades in the field before the war was over, whether to draw a bounty by enlisting in another regiment or to escape the perils of battle or any other improper purpose. If we let down the bars and by an act of Congress declare that a soldier who stood faithfully by his colors and with his command from the beginning to the end of the war, braving all hardships for his country's sake, shall stand no better in the eyes of Congress and in the history of his country than he who willfully deserted, we make a mistake. But guarded as this bill is by these amendments, I think it safe and right. But without the safeguards of these amendments I can not support the bill, for I am not willing to enact that a willful deserter from his command while the war was going on shall be put upon the same plane now and be counted equally worthy with those who served faithfully throughout the war. To do that is to dishonor the true soldier, and as a precedent it would be bad. It is against good discipline and would tend to discourage rather than encourage faithful service in time of war. Intentional desertion and faithful service are not the same and ought not to be put on an equality by an enactment of Congress.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE].

Mr. STEELE. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD].

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that unless this amendment upon which we are to vote has been more carefully examined by members generally than by those who have spoken upon it, we are going to vote without understanding fully the effect of the acceptance or rejection of the proposition. There are two important features in this amendment. One of these is in the very front. It is provided that if a soldier shall have returned in thirty days and served until the end of his term he shall be entitled now to an honorable discharge. Suppose, as a matter of fact, the soldier returned in thirty-one days, or thirty-five days, or forty days. What shade of equity shall justify the refusal of an honorable discharge to a man who returned to the service after perhaps thirty-five days' absence, while a discharge is given to the man who returned in thirty days?

Throughout this first section as it will stand if the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] be adopted there are presented objections equally pertinent, although the amendment embraces of course some good features. I call attention to this paragraph of the amendment:

Second. Men who deserted from hospital or from furlough given from a hospital while suffering from wounds, injuries, or disease received or contracted in the service and line of duty, and who on recovery returned voluntarily to the service and served honorably until discharged, or who died from such wounds, injury, or disease while so absent, and before the date of muster-out of their regiments.

Now, under this provision, in order that the person who was wounded and was furloughed from a hospital shall receive the benefit of the bill, he must have died—an extraordinary qualification for amnesty!

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEELE. I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER].

Mr. WELLER. I desire to call attention to another class of cases which it seems to me have not received proper consideration. I presented to the attention of the House the other day a certificate by the adjutant-general of the State of Wisconsin, with an accompanying letter setting forth the facts of a case where a man enlisted for one hundred days' service, and during that time was detailed for duty in his own State. His regiment was mustered out of the service, but he was unable to join his regiment in time to be properly mustered out, and to-day he is accounted a deserter. Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JONES] covers that case, while the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] does not cover it. There are thousands of other cases where the soldier left his command in the very closing hours of the war and returned to his home, believing the war was virtually over, and to-day all such men are borne upon the rolls as deserters. If we attempt to pass a bill which shall take into consideration and relieve every class of cases we shall make an utter failure of it, but if we will except the class which we desire shall receive no benefit at the hands of Congress in the way of relief, we can provide for the relief of all those who ought to have it. It seems to me the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin covers the whole case.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired, and debate is exhausted.

Mr. STEELE. I had two minutes, and only yielded one minute and a half.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JONES] had five minutes under the order of the House, and he yielded three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] and two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE]. The Chair has allowed gentlemen to overrun their time to a considerable extent.

Mr. STEELE. I had the floor for a certain time and no one can take it from me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. STEELE. I only yielded one minute and a half of my two minutes—one minute to the gentleman from Nebraska and a half-minute to the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yielded his time and it has expired.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a question of order. What has become of the other half-minute I did not yield?

The CHAIRMAN. It has "gone into the abysm and rearward of time." [Laughter.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. I have an amendment to offer which I would like to have an opportunity of explaining.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I will move then, in the first proposition of the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], to strike out "men," and insert "the soldiers who served in the late war in the volunteer forces of the United States;" so that if amended it will read as follows:

First. All soldiers who served in the late war in the volunteer forces of the United States charged with desertion, who voluntarily returned to their commands within thirty days, and served honorably to the end of their term of service.

Mr. COBB. Is an amendment to that amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. LAIRD. The words "and sailors" should be inserted. We have a good deal of legislation here about soldiers, and sailors are never included, as they ought to be.

The question recurred on Mr. CUTCHEON'S amendment to the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 34.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOREY. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] by adding the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

Soldiers who from sickness or other cause, not of their fault, were separated from their commands and returned on their recovery from such sickness or the removal of such other cause of absence.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The gentleman should insert in his amendment "voluntarily."

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. COBB. I offer an amendment to the amendment, to come in at the proper place.

The Clerk read as follows:

Or men who left their commands temporarily without leave, and who were voluntarily returning to their commands, but who were prevented from doing so by being arrested as deserters.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is already covered by the proposed amendment.

Mr. COBB. I think not fully.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why not make that an amendment to the original measure?

The CHAIRMAN. It will come in with the rest of the exceptions.

The question was taken, and the Chair decided that by the sound the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. COBB. I ask for a division.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to know where that comes in.

The CHAIRMAN. It is proposed to add to the seventh clause of the pending amendment the amendment just read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to ask my friend whether he intends to submit this as an amendment to the proposition of Mr. BROWNE or to the original bill?

Mr. COBB. I propose it as an amendment to the pending amendment of my colleague, although I am not particular at what point in the bill it is inserted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it will be better as an amendment to the original bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I make the point that all debate is out of order. The committee is dividing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana demanded a division upon the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 7, noes 34.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, in the first paragraph and in the seventh paragraph, the words "thirty days," and insert in place the words "six months."

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the amendment be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is proposed in the first proposition of the amendment submitted by Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, to strike out the words "thirty days" and insert the words "six months;" and also, in the seventh clause of the amendment, to strike out the words "thirty days" and insert "six months."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana as modified.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I wish to move a further amendment to the first proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, by striking out the words "within thirty days." That will leave it entirely in the discretion of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If not too late to offer an amendment to the second clause, after the words "line of duty" I propose to insert the words "or who were left sick in camp or on the march." I think that will commend itself to all.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I wish to make one further proposition, so as to make the whole amendment consistent with the first clause. I move to amend by striking out the word "men" in the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh clauses, and inserting the words "all such soldiers."

The amendment was agreed to

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] as modified.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 56.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the second section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the charge of desertion standing on the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the United States against any soldier who served in the late war in the volunteer service shall also be removed in all cases where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, from such rolls and records, or from other satisfactory testimony, that such soldier charged with desertion or with absence without leave, after such charge of desertion or absence without leave, voluntarily returned to his command, or who subsequently enlisted in another regiment or company and served in the line of his duty until he was mustered out of the service and received a certificate of honorable discharge.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I now ask to have the amendment which I have sent up read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the end of section 2 the following:

"Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not be applicable to any soldier who willfully deserted for the purpose of obtaining the bounty or other pecuniary reward by re-enlistment; and the granting of relief in each case shall be discretionary with the Secretary of War after an investigation of the facts."

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment which has the unanimous concurrence of our committee. We believe that the House has acted wisely in voting down the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE]. The large number of amendments which have been offered to the one proposed by him illustrate better than any argument can that when you attempt to restrict the discretion of the Secretary of War by certain specific rules you render the law of but little effect. Every gentleman here can by a hasty examination see that many meritorious soldiers would be denied just relief if inflexible rules should be adopted. Every case depends upon its own peculiar facts, and we can not in advance enumerate all the instances which will merit relief.

Several times Congress has found it necessary to legislate upon this subject. Two or three bills have been passed heretofore to relieve those men who, by some ignorance of their own, or perhaps by their carelessness or by the accidents of army life, have found their names unjustly on the roll of deserters. Probably every member of Congress has had the fact brought home to him that the laws now in existence do not do justice to some one or more of these men. Those laws fail because they attempt to restrict too much the discretion of the person whose duty it is to decide in each case.

Our committee believe that if the amendment I have proposed be adopted it will be unnecessary for those whom we would relieve to either present special bills hereafter or to ask for further general legislation.

There can be but one question. Is it dangerous to intrust this discretion to the Secretary of War? Is it unsafe to allow him to judge of the merits of each case? We believe not. He has the whole record of the soldier subject to his inspection. He can make such further investigation as may be proper in every case. The restriction we do seek to impose is to prevent that class known as bounty-jumpers from being beneficiaries under the bill. We believe the public interest will be best subserved by giving the Secretary a wide discretion in these cases which are constantly being brought before us, and which we have neither the time nor opportunity to investigate.

I trust that the House will agree with us, and that the bill with this amendment will receive favorable action.

The gentleman from Delaware has called my attention to another amendment, making the law also applicable to those in the naval service, and I think our committee will be willing to accept such an amendment.

Mr. LAIRD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LORE] is recognized.

Mr. LORE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer his amendment as an amendment to that of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. LORE. I will withhold it for the present.

Mr. LAIRD. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether he would be willing to accept an amendment including the Navy?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. That is an amendment which is about to be offered which we propose to accept.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. ROSECRANS. It may be either that or a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JONES].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2, in line 11, by inserting after the word "company" the following: "Without having done so to escape punishment for misconduct or without having received any bounty or pecuniary reward therefor."

Mr. LAIRD. If the committee is to adopt that amendment I should like the gentleman from California to modify it by inserting the word "additional" before the word "bounty." I make this suggestion for this reason: As a matter of fact if a man had served over six months, or at least nine months after 1862, and then left his command and afterward enlisted in a veteran regiment he became a veteran and entitled to bounty. He could not enlist after 1862 without receiving bounty. Therefore I suggest that the word "additional" be added.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I accept the suggestion and modify the amendment accordingly.

Mr. LAIRD. I will state, however, that I am opposed to the amendment and would leave the matter as the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin has left it.

Mr. ROWELL. I suggest to the gentleman from California that the amendment already adopted substantially covers his.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I make the point of order that an amendment equivalent to the proposed amendment of the gentleman from California has already been adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a point of order. That is a question for the committee to decide.

The amendment of Mr. ROSECRANS was not agreed to.

Mr. LORE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2 by inserting in line 11, after the word "company," the following: "or in the United States naval forces."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 2, after the word "leave," in line 9, insert "or men who left their commands temporarily without leave, and who were voluntarily returning to their commands, but who were prevented from doing so by being arrested as deserters."

Mr. ROWELL. That is covered absolutely by the amendment already adopted.

Mr. COBB. I do not think it is.

Mr. CURTIN. I think it is covered by the amendment already adopted.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That when the charge of desertion shall be removed under the provisions of this act from the record of any soldier, such soldier, or in case of his death the heirs or legal representatives of such soldier, shall receive all pay and bounty which may have been withheld on account of such charge of desertion or absence without leave: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to give to any such soldier as may be entitled to relief under the provisions of this act, or in case of his death to the heirs or legal representatives of any such soldier, the right to receive pay and bounty for any period of time during which such soldier was absent from his command without leave of absence.

Mr. LACEY. I desire to offer as an additional section what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the accounting officers of the Treasury Department shall make no charge on account of any overpayment made previous to the 16th day of March, 1868, to any non-commissioned officer, musician, or private in the late civil war, and no prosecution shall be instituted or further prosecuted to recover such overpayment.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I make the point of order that that is not germane to this bill.

Mr. LACEY. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point of order. The amendment is accepted by the committee, as I understand.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. No matter if it is; it is not germane to this bill. Let it come before the House in its regular order.

Mr. LACEY. I insist that the amendment is germane to the bill, and the committee in charge of the bill do not raise the point of order. The new section I propose puts a limitation on actions against soldiers to whom overpayments were accidentally made. Paymasters and quartermasters and other commissioned officers have been relieved of their responsibilities to the date mentioned in this section, and it is only right that soldiers, musicians, and non-commissioned officers should also be relieved from suit for such overpayment.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Michigan state the relation which exists between the section he proposes and the removal of the charges of desertion which is the subject-matter of the bill? The Chair is unable to see wherein the matter of his amendment is germane to the pending bill.

Mr. LACEY. The object of this bill is to relieve soldiers from certain disabilities, and it seems to me that as this proposes to remove disabilities they are laboring under by reason of overpayments accidentally made it is germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to sustain the point of order. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. PERKINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the fourth section insert the following:

"Unless such absence without leave resulted from his confinement as a prisoner of war."

Mr. PERKINS. The proviso attached to the fourth section precludes any soldier from getting any pay during the time he is marked absent without leave. I think that is unjust to those who were marked as absent without leave in consequence of being prisoners of war. The amendment I offer is to limit the effect of the proviso in that particular.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I move that the bill with the amendments thereto be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The question being taken, the chairman stated that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 13.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I withdraw the call for a quorum so that the bill may be reported, and I shall ask for a vote in the House.

No further count being called for, the motion of Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, was agreed to; and the bill, with the amendments thereto, was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SPRINGER took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

JOHN P. GREGSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 257) for the relief of John P. Gregson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $422.24 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, to reimburse John P. Gregson, secretary to commander-in-chief, for expenses paid by him on account of compulsory residence in Rio de Janeiro from December 23, 1873, to July 12, 1874, during the absence of the flag-ship Lancaster, in pursuance of the order of Rear-Admiral J. H. Strong, commanding United States force on South Atlantic station.

The report (by Mr. THOMAS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 257) for the relief of John P. Gregson, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report as follows:

A bill identical with this one was considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives during the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress, and the facts and their conclusions thereon fully ascertained and reported to the House. Your committee, after fully considering the whole case, ask leave to adopt said former report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

"Mr. Elam, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted the following report (to accompany bill H. R. 2304):

"The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2304) for the relief of John P. Gregson, beg leave to report as follows:

"They find that by the order of Rear-Admiral J. H. Strong, commanding United States naval force, South Atlantic station, dated Monongahela, Rio de Janeiro, December 23, 1873, the said John P. Gregson, secretary to the commander-in-chief, was directed to take quarters on shore until the arrival of the Lancaster, because there were no quarters for the commander and his staff on shipboard, and that said secretary remained on shore until July 12, 1874, when he went on board of the flag-ship Lancaster, as directed by the said Rear-Admiral J. H. Strong, and that the evidence further shows that the bill presented by the memorialist is correct and ought to be paid; wherefore they recommend the passage of the bill."

Mr. THOMAS. The facts in the case as stated in the report are all the facts that have come to the attention of the committee. As a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs I have investigated this subject thoroughly, and I find that without any fault on the part of this man John P. Gregson, who was secretary to the admiral in command of the United States naval forces on the South Atlantic station, he was compelled to pay out of his own pocket the sum of money mentioned in the bill while performing duty in compliance with the orders of the admiral. This necessity grew out of the fact that the yellow fever broke out on board the ship and it was necessary for the officers and crew to remove from it.

This claim is certainly just and ought to have been paid long since. It has been reported favorably time and again, and no one questions the justice of it. I hope it will be passed.

I desire to say further that there were two men situated exactly alike. Subsequently to the introduction of this bill and its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs a bill was introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] for the relief of the other party, and referred to the Committee on Claims. They stand on exactly the same footing. Each was compelled to pay out of his own private funds a sum of money which ought to be reimbursed to him. That bill, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, has been investigated by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. RAY], who informs me that each case is equally meritorious.

As the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] sees no other way of reaching action by the House on his bill, he has prepared a bill including both of these claimants and, if no one else objects, I shall not object to substituting that bill for the one now before the committee, so that the two claimants may have justice done them at the same time. As I have said, they stand exactly upon the same footing; they were compelled to pay out the same sum of money; and I will yield to the gentleman from New York to move his substitute, which includes both cases.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Before the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] takes his seat, I desire to inquire of him what has been the custom in cases of this kind.

Mr. THOMAS. The custom has been to allow the claims.

Mr. MCMILLIN. By what authority?

Mr. THOMAS. This was an extraordinary case.

Mr. MCMILLIN. By what authority have these claims been allowed?

Mr. THOMAS. By authority of special acts of Congress.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In what other cases has this been done?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not now recollect the names of the claimants, but I know it was done in the case of a part of the officers and crew of the Saratoga at the time when the yellow fever broke out on that vessel in the West Indies and they were compelled to be transferred to the shore. It was also done in one case on the Swatara, and in another case on the Lackawanna. There have been three cases where bills of this character have been paid.

There was no choice on the part of these men; they were in the service and were compelled, by the orders of the admiral, to go on shore and pay for their board and lodging out of their own private funds. This bill proposes simply to refund them the amount they were compelled to pay.

Mr. WOLFORD. Are these claimants allowed interest on the money which they paid?

Mr. THOMAS. They are not; this bill is to pay them exactly the same amount which they paid out, without interest.

Mr. WOLFORD. They ought to have interest.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] for what he has said and indorse every word of it. I want to add a single word or two. I hold in my hand the substitute to which he refers, for the relief of John P. Gregson and Francis H. Ellison. In the Forty-sixth Congress a bill was introduced for the relief of Francis H. Ellison, which was unanimously recommended by the committee. The committee having the bill under consideration, reporting through Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey, reported that Mr. Ellison should not be exclusively favored by the bill, but that Mr. John P. Gregson should also be included.

The two men, Gregson and Ellison, stand on exactly the same footing, having been compelled to pay out of their own pockets exactly the same sum of money. For more than ten years they have been badgered about from one point to another, one getting in at one time and another getting in at another. The last mistake was made in reference to the bill which I introduced for the relief of Mr. Ellison. Instead of going to the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which my friend from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] is a member, and which had charge of the bill for the relief of Mr. Gregson, it went to the Committee on Claims. The Committee on Claims referred it to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. RAY], who finds that the claim is all right.

These claimants having been kept separate so long, with the permission of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] reporting the bill now under consideration, I will offer a substitute which I have prepared, uniting the two claims in the same bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] proposes a substitute for the pending bill, which will be read.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $844.48 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, to reimburse John P. Gregson and Francis H. Ellison for expenses paid by them on account of compulsory residence in Rio de Janeiro from December 23, 1873, to July 12, 1874, during the absence of the flag-ship Lancaster, in pursuance of the order of Rear-Admiral J. H. Strong, commanding the United States force on South Atlantic station; one-half of said sum to be paid to the said John P. Gregson and the said Francis H. Ellison, respectively.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the report will be read.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been read.

A MEMBER. What is the amount involved?

Mr. THOMAS. Eight hundred and forty-five dollars to the two claimants.

Mr. HOLMAN. I was out of the Hall for a short time; and I suppose the report was read during my absence. I have not been able to understand the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS. I will very gladly repeat it if thereby the passage of this very just measure can be expedited.

Mr. HOLMAN. As I see that gentlemen here who have been watching the bill think that the substitute should be adopted, I will make no objection.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MYRA CLARK GAINES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1000) for the relief of Myra Clark Gaines.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas it appears that Myra Clark Gaines, as the legal representative of Daniel Clark, deceased, of Louisiana, is entitled to 39,737 arpents of land, being a portion of a grant made by Spain to Thomas Urquhart, and 5,470 arpens, being a portion of a grant made by Spain to John Lynd, amounting altogether to 45,207 arpents, equal to 38,457 acres of land: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That patents shall issue in the usual manner to Myra Clark Gaines, her heirs and assigns, for all of the aforesaid lands which the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall find to be vacant, unappropriated, and undisposed of by the United States, which patents shall operate only as a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States, and shall not in any wise impair or preclude any adverse claimant or claimants from the right to assert the validity of their claim or claims in a court or courts of justice: Provided, That no mineral lands shall be granted by this act, or located by the scrip to be issued pursuant to this act.

SEC. 2. That for all of said lands which have been disposed of by the United States, or otherwise lawfully appropriated, the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall issue in lieu thereof certificates of location of the character prescribed by the sixth section of the act of Congress approved June 22, 1860, entitled "An act for the final adjustment of private land claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana, and Missouri, and for other purposes."

SEC. 3. That the provisions of the act of Congress approved January 28, 1879, entitled "An act defining the manner in which certain land-scrip may be assigned and located or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patents in the name of the locator or his legal representatives," shall apply to all the certificates of location which are issued under this act as aforesaid.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. COSGROVE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 1000:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1000) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico, having considered the same, make the following report:

That the committee find the facts to be as stated in House Report No. 531, Forty-seventh Congress, first session, which said report is hereto annexed and made a part of this report:

"This claim is based upon two grants of land made by Morales, intendent general of the Spanish province of West Florida: one, embracing 50,000 arpents, to Thomas Urquhart in 1803; the other, embracing 32,025 arpents, to John Lynde in 1806. They were both made in writing before the cession of said province to the United States by the Spanish Government, and while Spain claimed sovereignty over and had the actual possession of the same. The grants are therefore of the class entitled to confirmation, under the act of June 22, 1860 (12 Statutes, 85), which provides—

"'That any person or persons, and the legal representatives of any person or persons, who claim any lands lying within the States of Florida, Louisiana, or Missouri, by virtue of grant, concession, order of survey, permission to settle, or other written evidence of title, emanating from any foreign government, bearing date prior to the cession to the United States of the territory out of which such States were formed, or during the period when any such government claimed sovereignty, or had the actual possession of the district or territory in which the lands so claimed are situated, shall be and they are hereby authorized to make application for a confirmation of their title to the lands so claimed,' &c.

"The act further provides that applications may be made to the courts or to special commissioners, whom it designates, and that they shall hear and decide according to principles established by it, and justice and equity. With this limitation it gives to the courts power to pass final judgment, but requires that claims presented to the commissioners shall be reported to Congress for its action thereon.

"The act further provides that applications shall be accompanied by a sworn statement by the claimant of the lands supposed to be covered by his claim, according to the legal divisions and subdivisions of the surveys made by the United States, &c.; and it also provides that if the lands, or any of them, have been sold by the Government, or can not be surveyed and located, the claimant, if his title be confirmed, shall have the right to enter a quantity, equal in extent to the lands thus sold, of any of the public lands of the United States subject to private entry at $1.25 per acre.

"This act was fully reviewed and interpreted by the Supreme Court in the case of the United States vs. Lynde, 11 Wallace, 632. In that case, involving one of the titles now in question, the court, after reciting the facts relating to the acquisition of title by the United States of the territory in which the lands claimed by Mrs. Gaines are situated, and to the grants made by Spain while it continued to occupy and claim the same, as well as the facts relating to the action of our Government, legislative and judicial, respecting said grants, from the time of the cession made by the treaty of February 22, 1819, between Spain and the United States, till the passage of the act of June 22, 1860, says:

"'That the object of this act was to confirm the grants in question seems hardly to admit of a doubt. It is true that in prescribing the powers and duties of the special commissioner and the courts to whose decisions the applications were to be referred, it is provided that they shall decide thereon according to equity and justice. But it can hardly be contended, especially in view of what has already been said, that Congress meant by this language to authorize the said commissioners and courts to review the entire subject, and to decide what our Government ought to have done with regard to these grants. It could not have been the intention to throw the whole discussion open from the treaty of St. Ildefonso down to the present time, and to confer upon the tribunals named in the act the power which properly belonged to the political department of the Government, and to impose upon them the duty of declaring what the policy of the Government should be, or leave it to their, perhaps, varying judgments what were the true intent and meaning of the original treaties. That could not have been the design of Congress.

"'The act authorizes the claimants to present their claims for confirmation, and although it does not in so many words say that grants made by foreign governments while in possession of the territory and claiming so vereignty over it, if complete, regular, and fair, shall be sustained; yet that is the unavoidable inference to be derived from its language and from the events and course of decisions out of which it arose. And although it does not expressly repeal that part of the act of March 26, 1804, which declared void all grants of land within the ceded territories made after the date of the treaty of St. Ildefonso; yet its provisions, in order to have any effect at all, must be regarded as irreconcilable with that clause of the act of 1804, and, consequently, as repealing it by implication. We can not avoid the conclusion, therefore, that the act of June 22, 1860, was intended to validate all grants which were made by the Spanish Government to bona fide grantees of lands in the disputed territory while the Government remained in possession of the territory and claimed sovereignty over it, subject, of course, to the express exceptions of the treaty of 1819 and the supplementary declarations of the King of Spain finally annexed thereto.

"'What range of discretion was intended to be conferred upon the special commissioners and the courts by authorizing them to decide according to the principles of equity and justice is, perhaps, not entirely clear. The probable meaning is that these principles are to be applied to each particular case. If it should appear that a grant was obtained by fraud, or was affected by any other special vice, it would be the duty of the tribunals to reject it; or if it should appear that a claim was honest and meritorious, but defective in point of form or completeness, it might be the duty of the tribunals to sustain it as an equitable, if not strictly legal, title.

"'This view of the subject relieves us from the ungracious task of construing treaties and reviewing the conduct and policy of the Government. Congress, by the act of 1860, has declared its own policy, and has left us simply the office of judicially carrying out its enactments in individual cases as they come before us. Congress has laid down the general rule by placing the grants in question on a platform of equality with grants made by our own Government, and has left to the tribunals the duty of examining the merits of particular applications.'

"The act of 1860 provided that claims should be presented within five years from its date, but fixed no limitation as to when decisions thereon should be rendered. The civil war, which commenced soon after the passage of the act and continued until 1865, rendered the presentation of claims within the time limited impracticable. Congress, however, by act approved March 2, 1867 (14 Statutes, 544), revived and extended the provisions of the act of 1860 for the period of three years.

"Within the period prescribed by this act of revival and extension, to wit, in 1869, Mrs. Gaines presented her claim to the register and receiver of the land office at New Orleans, La., who were authorized and empowered to act as commissioners and to examine, decide, and report upon claims preferred to lands situated in their district.

"These officers, having the custody of the original Spanish and other records showing title in the applicant, decided that her claim was entitled to confirmation, and so reported to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, but failed to transmit with their report authenticated copies of the records and papers in their possession relating to the original grants, and the subsequent conveyances upon which they had based their opinion; and Mrs. Gaines, in making her application, failed to make the sworn statement required of the lands supposed to be covered by her claim, according to the legal divisions and subdivisions of the surveys made by the United States. Because of these defects and informalities in the proceedings and application, and because Commissioner Cosby, in his report upon the titles involved, under the act of April 25, 1812 (American State Papers, D. Green's edition, vol. 3, p. 54), classed them as lands not entitled to confirmation, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in transmitting the claim to Congress, reported against its confirmation.

"Mrs. Gaines has since filed with your committee the sworn statement of the lands supposed to be covered by her claim and duly authenticated evidence of the original grants made by the Spanish Government to Urquhart and Lynde; also duly authenticated evidence of the conveyance of the Urquhart lands and 5,470 arpents of the Lynde lands to her father, Daniel Clark, by the original grantees of the Spanish Government. She has thus cured the material defects in her original application.

"These papers have been referred by your committee to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for examination, and he has reported thereon, expressing the opinion that if they had been before his office at the time the original report on Mrs. Gaines' claim was made it would have been different; and that the grants under which she claims are entitled to confirmation.

"The Commissioner, however, finds and reports that of the 50,000 arpents granted to Urquhart by the Spanish Government, and by him conveyed to Daniel Clark, the father of Mrs. Gaines, she has conveyed to Caleb Cushing a tract containing 10,263 arpents, and that that amount of the original grant has been confirmed to him by decree of the Supreme Court of the United States, and satisfied, so that there is only remaining a balance of 39,737 arpents of said grant unconfirmed and unsatisfied.

"The Commissioner further finds and reports that the whole of the grant to Lynde, embracing 32,025 arpents, was confirmed to his heirs by the decree of the Supreme Court in the case of the United States vs Lynde, hereinbefore referred to, but that afterward, and upon a discovery of the fact that the original grantee had conveyed 5,470 arpents of the land to Daniel Clark, the father of Mrs. Gaines, the heirs of said Lynde were required to and did enter up a remittitur for that amount; and this further appears by the order of the court in that behalf, a copy of which has been filed with your committee.

"The report of Commissioner Cosby, to which reference was made in the first or original letter from the General Land Office respecting this claim, was made in 1814, before Congress had provided for the confirmation of claims of the class to which this belongs. Under the laws then in force Cosby expressed the opinion (page 62, American State Papers, Duff Green's edition, volume 3) that the claims should not be confirmed, because (1) the Government of the United States claimed an absolute property in the territory; (2) the Spanish Government evidently distrusted its own right to make these grants, as they were made in a manner different from its usages and customs previously adhered to. Nevertheless the commissioners suggested that as the Government of the United States had permitted Spain to remain in possession of the country and dispose of the lands to purchasers in good faith, it might be morally bound by considerations of policy and equity to make these purchasers compensation, and this appears to have been the view taken of the matter by Congress in the passage of the act of 1860, removing the objections contained in Cosby's report to a confirmation of grants made in the disputed territory while Spain retained possession of the same, and providing compensation for lands disposed of by the Government.

"The labors of your committee have been greatly lessened and simplified, not only by the construction placed upon the act of 1860 (by the Supreme Court), as above shown, but by the fact that said court has recognized the validity of the particular grants to Urquhart and Lynde, which constitute the basis of the present claim, and the further fact that it has also recognized and respected the derivative title of Mrs. Gaines. In the confirmation of 10,263 arpents of the original grant to Caleb Cushing, who claimed under a conveyance from Mrs. Gaines, the court necessarily passed upon both the original and derivative titles, and it did so, as will appear by reference to case No. 622, decided at the October term of the Supreme Court, A. D. 1873. In compelling the Lynde heirs to enter up a remittitur for 5,470 arpents of the lands embraced in the Lynde grant, in favor of Daniel Clark, because of the conveyance to him —— after having confirmed the original title, the court necessarily recognized and respected both the original and derivative title of said Clark.

"The Urquhart grant was for 50,000 arpents, embracing nine distinct tracts or sections, and your committee is convinced, from the evidence before it, that Spanish patents were issued for the whole amount, and for each tract, but that all of them, except one for 10,263 arpents, were subsequently destroyed by fire. But whether this be so or not is not material, as it is clearly shown that Urquhart purchased and paid for 50,000 arpents, and that that amount of land was duly surveyed and set off to him by the Spanish authorities under proper written orders of survey. This is sufficient, under the act of 1860, even if patents were not issued. Your committee finds that by the decisions of the Supreme Court in Gaines vs. Herman, 24 Howard, 555; Gaines vs. New Orleans, 6 Wall., 642; Gaines vs. De La Croix, ib., 719, and other cases, Mrs. Gaines has been fully recognized and held to be the sole heir and devisee of her father, the said Daniel Clark, to whom conveyances of the lands claimed by her were made by Urquhart and Lynde.

"This claim was before the Forty-fourth Congress, and was then reported favorably by the Committee on Private Land Claims.

"It was again before the Forty-fifth Congress, and reported favorably by the committee as to the 5,470 arpents claimed under the Lynde grant, but adversely as to the 39,737 arpents claimed under the Urquhart grant. This adverse report was based upon substantially the same grounds which actuated the Commissioner of the Land Office, when he made his original report in this case, which have now been removed; and because the Spanish patent produced by Mrs. Gaines appeared to be for 10,263 arpents instead of for 50,000 arpents. We think the committee erred, for the reason that a patent for the whole 50,000 arpents was not necessary, there being other and amply sufficient written evidence of title for the remainder in the orders of survey, duly executed, and the reports thereof; and, besides, it appears from the affidavit of Mr. Cox, and the deed from Urquhart to Clark, that patents were issued for the whole 50,000 arpents, and that all but one of them were destroyed by fire; and it appears from the patent that Urquhart purchased and paid for the whole 50,000 arpents.

"Your committee is, therefore, of the opinion that Mrs. Gaines is entitled to a confirmation of title to 39,737 arpents of the Urquhart grant and 5,470 arpents of the Lynde grant, making in all 45,207 arpents, equal to 38,457 acres."

The committee, therefore, adopt said House report as the report of this committee, and report the accompanying bill with the recommendation that it pass.

Mr. COSGROVE. Mr. Chairman, the report which has been read explains the points of this case very fully. Originally there were two grants of land, one to Urquhart and one to Lynde. The legality of both those grants has been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. Three reports in different Congresses have been made upon this case. There are included in what is known as the Lynde grant only something over 5,000 arpents, the whole quantity of land in question being about 38,000 acres.

The other day, when we were, as I supposed, about to enter upon the consideration of this bill, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] made the objection that the bill if passed would give the claimant, Mrs. Gaines, scrip which would be very valuable. I wish to state that this question was considered by the committee which reported the bill, and the measure has been drawn purposely to prevent anything of that kind. If the bill should pass the scrip to be issued by the Government in accordance with its provisions must be located upon what is known as "offered land," land worth only $1.25 per acre. The parties who may hold this scrip will not be at liberty to locate it wherever they may choose upon the public domain. If the scrip could be thus located it would become very valuable; it would be worth much more than $1.25 per acre. But the restrictions in this bill are those which are usual in all grants of this character. The location of the scrip to be issued under the bill is limited to such land as is in the market for sale and is known as offered land of the Government. So that the scrip can not be worth more than $1.25 per acre.

As gentlemen who have listened to the reading of the report are aware, Mr. Caleb Cushing in his lifetime received from Mrs. Gaines a conveyance of a portion of the land embraced in one of these grants; and, instead of proceeding as Mrs. Gaines did, he went into the courts to procure confirmation of his title under the act of 1860. I am informed by parties conversant with the facts that Mrs. Gaines, instead of going into the courts to have her title confirmed, as did Mr. Cushing, her grantee, whose title is the same as that of this claimant as to a part of this land, undertook to procure a confirmation of her title through the action of Congress. The result has been that she has obtained no relief from Congress. But her grantee, to whom she conveyed several thousand acres of this land, prosecuted his case in the courts, and obtained in the Supreme Court of the United States a judgment vesting in him the title.

The adjudication of that question was in my judgment an adjudication of the validity of the title of Mrs. Gaines under what is known as the Lynde grant. There were, as I have said, two grants, both made by the proper officer of the Spanish Government: one to a man named Urquhart and the other to John Lynde, and the validity of both these grants has been affirmed in two decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. In the case of the United States vs. Lynde (11 Wallace) the validity of the Lynde grant was settled beyond any question; and in the case of Mr. Cushing, which was also passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States, the validity of the title under the other grant was established.

Both of these grants were made in writing by the proper officer of the Spanish Government. I have papers here showing a perfect chain of paper title from the Spanish Government to General Clark, the father of this claimant. General Clark departed this life without having made any conveyance of his title, and so far as I am aware he left no will; so that the title became vested in the claimant as his heir under the laws of the country. I think her title is perfect. Unless some gentleman wishes to ask some question about the matter, I do not know that I need make any further statement.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Are there any conflicting claims here which we are undertaking to decide?

Mr. COSGROVE. None whatever; there are no adverse claims and no adverse claimants.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. We are to understand, then, that no other heirs are involved whatever?

Mr. COSGROVE. None except Mrs. Gaines's heirs.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And that there has been no settlement upon this land under the homestead or other laws?

Mr. COSGROVE. I can not speak further than I have on that point; but I understand there have been settlements made upon this land and that the Government has patented a portion if not the whole of it and conveyed it to other parties. There is a provision in the bill that in case the Government has conveyed to other parties scrip shall be issued to this lady for the amount of the property which the Government has taken from her.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is, that she is to be allowed other land in lieu of that which has been taken from her?

Mr. COSGROVE. Yes, in lieu of it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Are the rights of all other parties preserved in the bill?

Mr. COSGROVE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUNT. Does not Mrs. Gaines inherit this land under testamentary disposition?

Mr. COSGROVE. I did not so understand.

Mr. HUNT. And has not that testament under which Mrs. Gaines inherited this land been sustained by the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. COSGROVE. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi on that point.

Mr. MULDROW. There is no question about Mrs. Gaines being the sole heir of Daniel Clark. It has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in several cases that she is the sole heir of his estate under the will made by him in 1813. In those decisions of the Supreme Court they have set aside the former judgment of the court, which was that will did not entitle her to recover because sufficient proof was not adduced at the time when other parties were claiming under the prior will made in 1811. But as I have said, the last decision of the Supreme Court recognized Mrs. Gaines as the sole heir of Daniel Clarke. And she is claiming these lands as the heir, and the only heir, of that estate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Are the committee perfectly satisfied in regard to the chain of title?

Mr. COSGROVE. It is perfect.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In order that my friend may understand the purpose of my question, I will say that I was a member of the Private Land Claims Committee in the Forty-fifth Congress, and was a member of the subcommittee which investigated this claim of Mrs. Gaines. It seemed that it had been here ever since before the war, and from the beginning has been brought up in every Congress for action. Mr. Benjamin, of Louisiana, had charge of it in the Senate. Our subcommittee investigated the title to this land on the part of Mrs. Gaines, and I at least came to the conclusion that there was no chain of title which would bear the scrutiny of a court of law. That was the opinion of the committee, I believe, and on that ground we decided against the claim.

Mr. MULDROW. What Congress was that?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It was in the Forty-fifth Congress.

Mr. MULDROW. I think the gentleman's memory is at fault, as that Congress did not report against the case, but only reported against a part of it, and in favor of a part.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes, as to some 5,000 acres.

Mr. MULDROW. That is a part of this grant?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The Committee on Private Land Claims reported only in favor of the claim for those 5,000 acres. We had all the papers before us, and the committee reported to the House there was no perfect chain of title to the property. We had dry-goods boxes full of documents—some in French and some in Spanish. We had reports from the Land Office before us. For months we carefully investigated this matter, and finally we came to the conclusion there was no ground for the claim for a higher amount than 5,000 acres. If the gentleman now has other evidence I should like to hear what it is.

Mr. MULDROW. In the case which went before the Supreme Court of the United States the main title was allowed. The court confirmed the whole of that title, but before the decree was entered up the court was informed that John Lynde had conveyed about 5,000 acres to Daniel Clark. The court had entered a remittitur on the part of Lynde's heirs in favor of Clark's heir before they would perfect the decree. That was done under the direction of the Supreme Court, but in that adjudication the court passed upon the whole title of John Lynde from the Spanish Government. Now, Lynde's title was under a grant made by Morales, the Spanish intendant of Louisiana, and this remittitur being required by the decision of the court on the part of the Lynde heirs in favor of the Clark heirs was a confirmation of title to these 5,000 arpents. In determining the matter the court passed upon both the original as well as the derivative title——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let me interrupt the gentleman to ask when that decision was rendered?

Mr. MULDROW. I think it was in 1867, but I am not quite positive as to the date.

Then further, there is a deed here from Lynde to Daniel Clark for these 5,000 arpents. Now, Mr. Chairman, it will be seen that that covers entirely one branch of the case. As to the other part of the claim, I wish to say only this—and I refer now to the other part of this grant claimed through Urquhart: that was a grant from Morales, the Spanish intendant or governor, to him about the year 1803——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please suspend for a moment to receive a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, Mr. HOLMAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill (H. R. 6538) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Saint Croix River, in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested, a bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

MRS. MYRA CLARK GAINES.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MULDROW. This Intendant Morales, Mr. Chairman, was then exercising authority in behalf of the Spanish Government in that Territory, as shown by the decision of the Supreme Court, from about 1803 to 1810, and in the case of Lynde the Supreme Court declares that all parties holding titles under that Spanish intendant during that period of time, or during the period that Spain was exercising sovereignty there, should be protected in their rights. Now the grant to Urquhart was originally for 50,000 arpents, and there was a conveyance from Urquhart to Daniel Clark for the whole amount of the land which he received from the Spanish intendant.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will the gentleman from Mississippi please explain what kind of an agreement or conveyance that was? My recollection of the matter is, although it has been a long time since I looked into it, that it was an instrument in the nature of a mortgage, and a mortgage which had not been forclosed.

Mr. MULDROW. I understood that there was an absolute conveyance in fee.

Mr. COSGROVE. If the gentleman from Mississippi will permit me to interrupt him, I will say that there is no doubt upon that point. The deed is here among these papers, which shows that there was a consideration in money paid for this property.

Mr. MULDROW. Yes; the papers show that the money was paid.

Now, the only difficulty about the case in the mind of the Committee on Private Land Claims with respect to the subject is this, that after the conveyance to Daniel Clark the papers which evidenced the grant from Morales to Urquhart were destroyed by fire, except the paper relating to the 10,000 arpents which have been confirmed, as shown by the decision of the Supreme Court, to Caleb Cushing. That was not destroyed. But in passing upon the case of Cushing the Supreme Court, as I have already stated, took in the derivative as well as the original title as to the lands granted by Morales to Urquhart, and there is an affidavit on file showing the destruction of the papers; and not only that, but the act of 1860 provided that where there had been a survey, or order of survey, and the land had been partitioned from the common domain, the titles of the party should be confirmed, their rights respected and that this Government was bound to preserve the rights of the parties thus obtained from the Spanish Government.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let me ask the gentleman from Mississippi if it is not true that the Supreme Court recognized the grant of the Spanish Government made through Morales, as provincial governor, to Urquhart, and that the grant was lost or destroyed.

Mr. MULDROW. Only in part.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That the chain of title could not be established by the papers; and that reliance was had, to establish the claim of Mrs. Gaines, upon affidavits from same individuals that the papers had been destroyed? My recollection is that there was some such character of evidence introduced to establish the claim.

Mr. MULDROW. I think not.

Mr. COSGROVE. If the gentleman will permit me, I will repeat that the question of title, in my judgment, has been practically settled by the decision of the Supreme Court. The title adheres in Lynde only in part.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I recollect that when this question was before the committee we made a most diligent search of all the papers. We had the decision of the Supreme Court rendered in 1867 before us, and my recollection now is, although it has been a long time, some seven or eight years, since I have given any thought to the matter, that after a careful and diligent search in all of the documents presented to the committee, and there was more than a large dry-goods box full, we could not find after careful search of all of the evidence presented that there was any title whatever in this claimant to the property. The committee, after a diligent examination, and I may say a patient investigation of the case, came to the conclusion that Mrs. Gaines really had no foundation for any grant of land whatever. But as a sort of compromise some 5,000 acres were accorded to her. I remember that the case was carefully investigated. On her behalf ex-Senator Foote, of Mississippi, appeared and discussed the claim, and no one attempted to answer him in opposition, so that we were driven to the necessity ourselves of looking up the evidence against the claim, and came to the conclusion that there was no foundation whatever for a claim against the Government.

Mr. MULDROW. This claim was examined very thoroughly in the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses and has again been thoroughly examined in the present Congress; and each committee that took charge of the case reached the conclusion that the title was a good one and ought to be confirmed. This matter has been referred to the Commissioner of the Land Office and to the Secretary of the Interior, and they both reached the conclusion that it is a good and a valid claim under the law of 1860 whether the papers which constituted the grant from Morales to Urquhart have been destroyed or not; for this reason: that there is no dispute that these lands were segregated from the common domain by an actual order of survey and by a survey being actually made, and the act of 1860 in positive terms declares that where that has been done the party shall be protected in the rights which have been acquired through that instrumentality.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I understand the gentleman to state that the Caleb Cushing grant has already been vindicated.

Mr. MULDROW. Yes; it has been confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CUTCHEON. And what precludes Mrs. Gaines from having her title confirmed in the same way?

Mr. MULDROW. That was explained by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE].

Mr. CUTCHEON. I was not in the House when that gentleman spoke.

Mr. MULDROW. The law of 1860 provided two remedies. The first was that the party who had a claim of this character should go before the register and receiver of the land office at New Orleans, who compose the board of commissioners, and that this commission should take the evidence in the case and certify the facts and their conclusions to the Secretary of the Interior. If favorable or unfavorable, then the Secretary of the Interior should report those conclusions to Congress, and Congress should act then upon his report and confirm or not confirm, as the case should justify, upon its merits. Then there was another provision in the act of 1860 to the effect that in the first instance the party having a land claim should go before the district court of the United States in Louisiana, and in the event that the district court decided the case against the Government of the United States, the law was mandatory to take an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, for that court to review the decision of the district court. If the decision was in favor of the Government, then the claimant, at his option, could take that appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mrs. Gaines filed her petition before that board of commissioners; but in certifying the action of the commission to the Secretary of the Interior certain formal omissions were made. For instance, the act required that the petition and the proceedings should show the land by metes and bounds and other particulars required; and those particulars were not sent up to the Secretary of the Interior, and for that reason he, at that time, declined to confirm the title. But the objections were entirely technical, and did not go at all to the merits of the case.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi if at that point the Secretary of the Interior made the recommendation to which the gentleman referred awhile ago in reference to these lands.

Mr. MULDROW. At that time he did not, because of the technical objection he then urged that the law in regard to the certificates and affidavits to be transmitted to the Interior Department had not been complied with. But since that time the Commissioner of the Land Office says if that formal requirement had been complied with his decision would have been different and the claim would have been treated as a good one.

My attention is called by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT] to the fact that Daniel Clark left two wills. One, made in 1811, conveyed his property to his mother and named certain executors, Chew and Relph. Under that will the executors went forward under their letters testamentary and took charge of the estate and administered upon it. In 1819 they attempted to make a sale of this land, under the power which they claimed they had derived by virtue of this will of 1811. But that matter came up afterward before the Supreme Court in the case of Gaines vs. New Orleans, reported in 6 Wallace, when the Supreme Court held that the subsequent will of Daniel Clark was the one to be recognized by the courts, and that the action of the executors under the first will was invalid and passed no rights to the property.

In another recent decision of the Supreme Court, Mrs. Gaines is recognized as sole heir and devisee of Daniel Clark. And if Clark had the right to this property—and the committee reached the conclusion that he did have—then there is no question about the rights of Mrs. Gaines in this case.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is this a unanimous report by the committee?

Mr. MULDROW. It is.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MULDROW. Let us act on this bill before the committee rises.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Oh, no. I want, for one, to speak on it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have no wish to cut this off if we can get through with the pending bill in time to act on other bills that are to be reported.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This matter will have to be discussed further.

The motion of Mr. MCMILLIN was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had the Private Calendar under consideration, and had directed him to report sundry bills with amendments.

SANTIAGO DE LEON.

The SPEAKER. The first report from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar to be considered is the unfinished business, the bill (H. R. 1724) for the relief of Santiago de Leon. The pending question is on the passage of the bill. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] had demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as this measure belongs to quite a large class of claims that were cognizable by the Southern Claims Commission, it was agreed in Committee of the Whole that a vote on it should be had in the House. For that reason I have asked for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 19, noes 27.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the entire vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call attention to the fact that the Committee of the Whole, which reported this bill to the House, agreed unanimously that a yea-and-nay vote should be taken.

The question being taken, there were—yeas 92, nays 36, not voting 194; as follows:

The SPEAKER. Upon this question the yeas are 92, the nays 36. No quorum having voted, the bill has not passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose that unless the point is made that no quorum voted——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that when the fact appears upon the record by the call of the yeas and nays that no quorum has voted, the bill would not be passed. Under the rules of the House a quorum is required to transact business.

JAMES STACK.

Mr. MORRISON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6665) for the relief of James Stack, late a private of Company F, One hundred and thirtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. MCMILLIN, will preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of this evening. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, in pursuance of the order of the House heretofore made, the Chair declares the House in recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House at half past 7 o'clock p. m. resumed its session, Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order under which the House meets this evening.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That until the further order of this House, on each Friday the House will take a recess at 5 o'clock until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall be considered.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, in accordance with the order just read.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, in the chair.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, there are some bills which, by agreement, have been laid aside informally; and I ask that the House take up House bill 2702, on page 28 of the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the House will resume the consideration of the bill indicated by the gentleman.

There was no objection.

MRS. ELLIDA I. MIDDLETON.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2702) granting a pension to Mrs. Ellida I. Middleton, widow of the late Rear-Admiral Edward Middleton, United States Navy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name Ellida I. Middleton, widow of the late Rear-Admiral Edward Middleton, United States Navy, and to pay her, from and after the passage of this act, the sum of $50 per month.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I introduced this bill after examination and with a full knowledge of the circumstances of the case. Having, unfortunately, been absent from the House last Friday night, I feel it incumbent on me to return my thanks to the honorable gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT], the honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], the honorable gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS], the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN], and the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL], for their able advocacy of this bill. I do not know that I can now add anything to what was so well said by those gentlemen, but I feel I ought not to omit on the part of this widow as well as on my own part a proper acknowledgment of the support so ably given by them in this case.

This is perhaps one of the most meritorious cases of this class that I have ever known; and I hope that the bill will be passed. I think I am authorized to say that if the gentleman who opposed it on last Friday night had then known fully, as I have stated to him since, the circumstances of the case, he would not have opposed it. I believe that if now present he would not oppose it. I hope, therefore, that the bill will be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

CLARISSA T. MAIES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5464) granting a pension to Clarissa T. Maies.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Clarissa T. Maies, widow of William H. Maies, late a lieutenant in the United States Navy.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred a communication from the Commissioner of Pensions in relation to the claim of Clarissa T. Maies, widow of William H. Maies, late lieutenant in the United States Navy, respectfully submit the same to the House, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 20, 1884.

SIR: Under the provisions of the joint resolution of Congress approved May 29, 1830, I have the honor to transmit herewith the papers in the case of Clarissa T. Maies, widow of William H. Maies, late lieutenant United States Navy, application 3265, to consider the propriety of placing her name upon the pension-roll by special act of Congress, for the reason that her claim is deserving and meritorious, but can not be allowed under the general law.

It appears that this officer entered the service August 6, 1861, and was discharged

May 15, 1866; that he was reappointed April 23, 1867, and resigned July 16, 1868. He had an excellent record during his service, and was under treatment in March, 1863, for dyspepsia, in May, 1863, for diarrhea, and in April, 1864, for constipation. Soon after his discharge, in 1866, he had an attack of kidney disease, which is shown, from the evidence adduced by a special examiner, to have been caused by exposure in the service. There is no disability shown in the second service up to the time of resignation, July 16, 1868, when the officer entered the Japanese merchant service, in which service he continued up to within a short time of his death, on February 14, 1881, from Bright's disease of the kidneys.

The applicant is unable to furnish parol evidence to establish the connection of the fatal disease with the service, hence the office has rejected the claim, but from an examination of the evidence now on file it is more than probable that the disease which caused the officer's death had its origin in the service, and I therefore consider the claim a proper one for equitable relief, and inviting your attention to the papers, I submit the same to your consideration with my recommendation that the applicant be pensioned by special act, &c.

Very respectfully,

W. W. DUDLEY, Commissioner.

Hon. C. C. MATSON,
Chairman Committee on Invalid Pensions, House of Representatives.

Your committee have considered the recommendation of the Commissioner, and after a careful examination of the evidence in the case, and for the reasons herein stated, recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

CAROLINE M. M'DOUGAL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 79) granting a pension to Caroline M. McDougal, widow of Rear-Admiral David S. McDougal.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Caroline M. McDougal, widow of Rear-Admiral David S. McDougal, late of the United States Navy, and pay her a pension of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred bill H. R. 79, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

That the merits of this case were fully presented to the House by Mr. STEELE, from the Committee on Pensions of the Forty-seventh Congress, and your committee, after careful examination, adopt said report and recommend the passage of the bill upon the following statement of facts:

Rear-Admiral McDougal entered the Navy in 1828, and passed successively through all the grades to that of commodore on the active-list, in which latter grade he was honorably retired on attaining the age of 62. During his forty-three years of active service he filled with credit all the positions to which a naval officer is ever assigned in the grades through which he passed, and whether as a subordinate officer, as commander of a vessel, of a naval station, or of a squadron, left an unblemished record.

In 1863, while in command of the Wyoming, on the Asiatic station, he was ordered to avenge an insult to our flag offered by the Prince of Negato, who had rebelled against the liberal policy of the Tycoon toward western nations, and had fired upon vessels bearing our flag. Commander McDougal's vessel, carrying but six guns, and with a crew of about one hundred and sixty men, had to encounter a hostile force consisting of six shore batteries masked on commanding heights, and mounting three guns each, a steamer of two, a bark of six, and a brig of eight guns, making in all thirty-four guns, mostly thirty-two pounders, and worked and supported by a force of 1,100 men. The battle had to be fought in a narrow strait, full of dangers from sunken rocks and rapid currents which his enemy was perfectly familiar with, but of which Commander McDougal had no chart. Yet, notwithstanding the appalling dangers of the situation—a combined land and sea force aggregating seven times as many men, and working nearly six times as many guns as he had, and with the certainty of torture and death if captured, he engaged and destroyed his enemy, achieving a victory which, if ever equaled in our country's history, has not been excelled.

From 1869 to 1871, the day of his honorable retirement from active service, he commanded the South Pacific squadron. Of his forty-three years on the active-list thirteen were spent on shore duty and twenty-four at sea, a greater proportion of arduous duty than has been performed by any officer senior to him in the service, with a single exception. During his life he never received any recognition for his services except a routine promotion on the retired list, which carried with it none of the emoluments of the grade. Mrs. McDougal is much in need. Congress has on many occasions made precedents. Not to go further back than 1876, the following instances are cited in which this has been done: In 1876, to the widow of Commodore Elliott; in 1877, to the widows of Admirals Bell and Winslow; in 1878, to the widow of Admiral Wilkes; in 1879, of Commodores Frailey, Gallagher, and McKeever, and of Admiral Stringham; in 1880, of Admiral Davis; in 1881, of Admiral Paulding and Commodores McCauley and Guest; and finally, last winter and summer, to the widows of Admirals Goldsborough, Hoff, Reynolds, Lardner, Spotts, and Rodgers, and Commodore Wood.

David McDougal was appointed a midshipman in the Navy July 1, 1828; August 20, 1828, ordered to the naval school at New York; May 16, 1829, detached and ordered to the New York station; April 21, 1830, detached and ordered to the Boston; December 15, 1832, warranted as a midshipman; October 4, 1833, permitted to attend the naval school at Brooklyn; May 14, 1834, ordered to examination preliminary to promotion; June 14, 1834, promoted to passed midshipman; March 11, 1835, ordered to the receiving-ship at New York; July 1, 1836, ordered to the sloop Natchez; February 16, 1839, detached and granted leave; March 16, 1839, ordered to the receiving-ship at New York; September 14, 1839, detached and granted leave of absence; December 14, 1839, ordered to the Consort; October 12, 1840, detached from the Consort and will remain on duty with Lieutenant Glynn, working on charts; February 19, 1841, detached from duty on charts; February 25, 1841, promoted to lieutenant; May 19, 1841, ordered to the Fulton; December 6, 1841, detached and ordered to the Falmouth; March 21, 1841, detached on account of ill health; July 18, 1843, ordered to the Falmouth; January 27, 1844, detached and granted leave of absence; June 29, 1844, ordered to the Michigan; January 16, 1847, detached and ordered to the Mississippi; war with Mexico, at capture of Vera Cruz; June 11, 1847, detached from the home squadron and granted leave of absence; February 20, 1848, ordered to the St. Mary's; March 8, 1848, transferred to the Bainbridge; July 6, 1850, detached and granted leave of absence; June 18, 1851, ordered to the Michigan; March 2, 1854, detached and ordered to command the store-ship at San Francisco, Cal.; April 10, 1854, assumed command of the Warren; served on the John Hancock from February to August, 1856; January 24, 1857, promoted to commander; October 26, 1857, detached from the command of Warren and ordered to the navy-yard, Mare Island, California; May 11, 1861, detached and ordered to New York; May 27, 1861, ordered to command the Wyoming—while in command of this vessel engaged six batteries and three vessels of war at Simonoseki, Japan, on the 16th of July, 1863, sinking a brig and exploding the boilers of a steamer, with a loss of eleven killed and wounded aboard of the Wyoming; March 2, 1864, promoted to captain; July 20, 1864, detached from command of the Wyoming and placed on waiting orders: October 17, 1864, took temporary command of the navy-yard, Mare Island, California; August 11, 1866, detached and placed on waiting orders; April 24, 1867, ordered to command the Pensacola; July 17, 1867, detached and placed on waiting orders; December 2, 1867, ordered to command the Powhatan; June 12, 1869, promoted to commodore; December 23, 1869, detached from command of the Powhatan and ordered to command the South Pacific squadron; September 27, 1871, placed on the retired-list; February 28, 1872, detached from command of the South Pacific squadron and placed on waiting orders; July 5, 1876, commissioned as rear-admiral on the retired-list from the 24th August, 1873.

He died at San Francisco, Cal., on the 7th of August, 1882.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ISAAC REED.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4014) for the relief of Isaac Reed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions, regulations, and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Isaac Reed, late a private in Company F, Twenty-sixth Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and now a resident of the town of Cannelton and County of Perry, in the State of Indiana.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4014) granting a pension to Isaac Reed, would respectfully report:

That Isaac Reed enlisted and was mustered in as a private in Company F, Twenty-sixth Indiana Volunteers, on the 30th day of August, 1861, at Indianapolis, Ind.

That he served faithfully in the service of the United States from the date of his muster until the month of July, 1863, when he became ruptured in the performance of detail duty in building earth works in the siege of Vicksburg.

That since that date and until mustered out of the service he was in the hospital service and transferred to the invalid corps, and has been a sick and disabled man ever since.

That on the 3d day of February, 1865, he stated in his application for pension that hernia existed prior to his enlistment, not larger, however, than the size of a pea. In a subsequent affidavit he states that he did not understand the medical term used by the examining surgeon, and had misstated the case of his disability, and but for which he would have been pensioned years ago.

That prior to his enlistment in the service of the United States he was a strong and able-bodied man, following his occupation as a coal-miner. That since his discharge he is so disabled as to prevent him from mining or performing any other kind of manual labor.

The above statements are substantiated by the affidavits of J. A. Burkett, late captain of Company F aforesaid, and acknowledged before the clerk of the court of Perry County, Indiana; also by Dr. Thomas R. Austin, examining surgeon, and a large number of equally creditable witnesses.

In his letter rejecting the claim the Commissioner of Pensions writes under date of May, 1882, as follows:

"Although this case can not apparently be admitted under existing law, it is believed to be meritorious, and has therefore been this day referred to the House Committee on Pensions for their consideration."

The claimant, by reason of his total disability, is in destitute circumstances, and the committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MARIA L. LEE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1752) for the relief of Maria L. Lee.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Maria L. Lee, widow of Abel H. Lee, who was a scout in the Army of the Potomac during the war of the rebellion, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws of the United States.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1752) granting a pension to Maria L. Lee, having duly considered the evidence in the case, beg leave to submit the following report:

The said Maria L. Lee is the widow of Abel H. Lee, who was a scout in the Army of the Potomac during the late war. The duties he performed consisted of ascertaining the forces and positions of the enemy and the discoveries of points on the Potomac for the landing of troops, and also the discovery of points where mails of the enemy could be found and captured.

During the war the said Lee was captured by the enemy and remained during sixteen months a prisoner in their hands, and was in Libby and other prisons of the enemy until exchanged; at which time his health was broken, the seeds of disease having been planted in his system during his prison life, and from which he died soon after his return home.

The evidence shows that in his capacity of scout he rendered efficient service; was commended by General Mansfield for said service, and by General Mansfield recommended for employment to the Navy Department.

The proof shows that Lee was a sound man when he became a scout, and there is medical evidence in the papers that his death was occasioned by disease contracted in the service of the Government in the semi-military capacity of scout.

The committee are of opinion that Mrs. Lee is in equity entitled to pension, and recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

CATHARINE BULLARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 406) granting a pension to Catharine Bullard.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Catharine Bullard, widow of Dr. Talbott Bullard, deceased, an acting volunteer surgeon, and to pay her a pension at the same rate as the widows of surgeons of volunteers are now paid; the same to begin from and after the date of his death, to wit, June 16, 1863.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 406) granting a pension to Catharine Bullard, having duly considered the evidence in the case, submit the following report:

Mrs. Catharine Bullard is the widow of Dr. Talbott Bullard, who, at the commencement of the war of the rebellion, was in lucrative practice as a physician and surgeon, at Indianapolis, Ind. At that time the Government was in urgent need of surgeons to care for the sick and wounded Federal soldiers in hospitals at Indianapolis, and the sick and wounded confederate soldiers held at that place as prisoners of war. In pursuance of the system early inaugurated by Governor Morton, of Indiana, to relieve the wants of Indiana soldiers in all departments of the Federal Army, and the confederate soldiers who by the vicissitudes of war were held as prisoners at Indianapolis, Dr. Bullard was placed in charge of Center Hospital, where the sick and wounded confederate soldiers were taken for medical and surgical treatment.

Soon after this, in 1862, Dr. Bullard, in connection with Dr. Parvin, went to Richmond, Ky., immediately after the battle at that place, and under a "flag of truce" proceeded within the enemy's lines to minister to the necessities of Federal soldiers wounded and made prisoners in that battle.

In October of the same year, Dr. Bullard visited the camps and hospitals of the Army of the Potomac, at the front, for the purpose of caring for the sick and wounded.

Again, in December, 1862, for a like purpose, Dr. Bullard visited the Army of the Cumberland.

His last trip to the front was made in May, 1863, to the Army of the Tennessee, in front of Vicksburg, then commanded by General Grant. The Adjutant-General, in his report, published in 1869, (Vol. I, page 352), says of this trip:

"The third mission was on the Courier, under charge of Dr. Talbott Bullard and General A. Stone, with five hundred packages of stores, several nurses and surgeons. A large number of sick and wounded men were brought back. But the expedition is said by Dr. Hanneman to have been most unfortunate to those engaged in it, for four surgeons died during the trip, or soon after their return, among them the ever-to-be lamented Dr. Bullard. He was a man of warm temperament, and when duty called him never thought of self. His was a most valuable life to be sacrificed to this accursed rebellion."

This service was rendered at the special instance and written request of Governor Morton, and though not entirely under Federal supervision, was a part of the grand system of relief of sick and wounded soldiers, inaugurated in most of the States, which everywhere received the hearty approval of the General Government, as an important and necessary auxiliary in ameliorating the suffering of sick and wounded soldiers during the late war.

On page 321, volume 1, of the Soldiers of Indiana in the War for the Union, a work published in 1866, will be found the following tribute to Dr. Bullard:

"Dr. Bullard, one of the oldest and most prominent physicians in the town, was placed in charge of the new rebel hospital. He was an enthusiastic Union man, but no more tender heart than his ever beat, and he did not afterward toil more devotedly for loyal sufferers—although he died a victim to his exertion—than he did for the prisoners during the whole time a rebel hospital was under his care."

Dr. Bullard was in usual health when he left Evansville, Ind., on the steamer Courier, in command of General Stone, with fifty-four surgeons and assistants, on his last trip to the front, and reached General Grant's army in front of Vicksburg June 1, 1863. While with the Army in front of Vicksburg engaged in caring for the sick and wounded Union soldiers, as a result of his incessant labors and exposure in the extremely unhealthy region of Vicksburg and the Yazoo Bayou, he fell a victim to dysentery, and it became necessary to send him home, where he died June 16, 1863, two days after his arrival, from dysentery and hemorrhage of the bowels.

Dr. Bullard was constantly in the public service from the commencement of the war until his death, to the entire abandonment of his private practice. For this service he received no compensation from the Government.

The valuable services rendered the Government by Dr. Bullard is attested by General James A. Ekin, Quartermaster-General United States Army, in a letter to Senator HARRISON, in which he says:

"The value of Dr. Bullard's services can not, in my judgment, be overestimated, and I regard his death as resulting in consequence of his exposure to the dangers and hardships of the camp while ministering to the wants and necessities of our wounded soldiers. He made many sacrifices in order to contribute to the comfort of those who entered the public service to maintain the integrity of the Government. Having been stationed at Indianapolis during those perilous times, Dr. Bullard's services and sacrifices were well known to me. He was a true man and a true patriot."

The affidavits of Dr. W. Clinton Thompson, William B. Fletcher, and John M. Kitchen, all of Indianapolis, state that Dr. Bullard was a prominent physician with a large practice, and that his death was due to exposure and the nature of his service at Vicksburg.

The Hon. W. W. Dudley, Commissioner of Pensions, in a letter to the chairman of this committee, inclosing a copy of the bill for the relief of Mrs. Bullard, under date of February 8, 1884, says:

"The bill inclosed represents a case which appeals strongly to the equitable power of Congress, as the death from exposure is, I think, made clear."

The faithful care and attention given confederate prisoners in Center Hospital, Indianapolis, of which he was given full control, is shown by a testimonial from the men thus confined, in which they say, under date of April 10, 1862:

"We have seen that, while many are seeking power and place, you seem only to seek the power to do good and a place in the hearts of your fellow-men. Could anything compensate for the loss of liberty, could anything beguile us in our capacity, it would be the brotherly kindness and tender solicitude which you constantly manifest in our behalf."

The high social and professional standing of Dr. Bullard is fully shown by the letters of Governor Morton and other citizens of the highest repute in Indiana.

Mrs. Bullard has never remarried, and has no near relatives on whom to rely for support, except a son living in Montana Territory, who is a physician, 30 years of age, whose practice is barely sufficient to support his own family. Two years ago she lost by death a son, who was her only means of support, and has no property except her home and a little real estate adjoining it, all of which is mortgaged to such an extent as to leave her little revenue from it. She is compelled to rely upon her own exertions as a teacher for a living, but being now 56 years of age she can not reasonably expect a continuance of this her only means of support.

In view of the facts fully shown in this case, that Dr. Bullard rendered valuable service to the Government, losing his life as a result of this service, though never in its employ, your committee recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "paid" in the eighth line.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to strike out at the end of the bill the words "the same to begin from and after the date of his death, to wit, June 16, 1863," was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

KATE AMANN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 320) granting a pension to Kate Amann.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Kate Amann, widow of Philip Amann, late a private in Company D, Seventy-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 320) granting a pension to Kate Amann, having considered the evidence, beg leave to report:

That Kate Amann is the widow of Philip Amann, who was a private in Company D, Seventy-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and who was discharged from the service February 25, 1863, on account of two gunshot wounds received at the second Bull Run battle, August 30, 1862, one ball having passed through the right leg, the other through the right foot. That he was pensioned on account of said wounds, to date from the time of his discharge, and continued to receive a pension until the time of his death, November 15, 1880, which occurred in the following manner: The evidence shows the fact that while engaged with others working in a stone-yard the derrick used by them for moving and hoisting stone fell on the said Amann, crushing him to death. This accident occurred through no fault nor by any negligence on the part of the said Amann. And in the opinion of your committee, had it not been for his disabled condition caused by his wounds, he would have been enabled to escape the injury which resulted in his death; that those who were engaged with him at the time of his death, and who were exposed to the danger in as great a degree as the said Amann was, did escape death by reason of the fact that they possessed the full use of their limbs. Your committee further find that the said Amann was a sober and industrious man, of good moral character.

That the claimant, Kate Amann, is in reduced circumstances, supporting herself and family by washing and such other hard labor as she can get to do.

In consideration of all the facts the committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to know the evidence upon which the committee based the conclusion that this man would not have been killed in the accident described in the report if he had not been disabled by his wounds. It seems to me that his wounds can only be regarded as having a very remote connection with his death.

Mr. MATSON. Of course the injuries received by this soldier in the military service did not directly occasion his death; but the committee was thoroughly satisfied that they contributed to this result to such an extent as to justify the granting of a pension. As stated in the report, the evidence of those who were with this man at the time of the accident, and who were quite as much exposed to peril, is that while they were able to escape he could not do so by reason of his wounds. In their judgment (and we feel no doubt that the conclusion is a correct one) this man would not have lost his life by reason of this accident but for the fact that his right leg was disabled by two gunshot wounds.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Let me ask the gentleman if it is not true that the Pension Department sometimes grants pensions in cases of persons who have lost their lives from accidents by reason of the fact that they were unable, in consequence of sickness or wounds, to take care of themselves?

Mr. MATSON. I think the rule of law is administered very rigidly, and that the disease should have produced death before the pension is granted.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, in the case of three men, able-bodied, in equal good health, engaged on the same work, and equally exposed, one is sometimes killed in case of accident and the other two escape uninjured. It very frequently occurs. It is a very difficult matter to show; in fact you cannot show anything more in this case than a mere presumption. You cannot prove it to be a fact, and it is utterly impossible to establish by evidence that this man would have escaped if he had been perfectly sound.

Now, I do not propose to oppose this bill; but I simply rose to call attention to the fact that this is another stretch of your pension laws and a considerable one.

It is not a case where a man could recover in a court of law upon that kind of evidence; that is one thing certain. If such a question was presented in a court for damages and the evidence was no stronger to prove the case than the remote cause assigned here of this man's death, it strikes me that there is no court in this country where you would be likely to recover. If it was an endeavor to prove to a court that his death would have resulted from the wounds, he would hardly be able to recover if this was the only testimony submitted. And yet upon just such testimony we are expected to pass these bills.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this House ought not to sit here in the consideration of claims for pensions and surround itself with all the rigid formalities of a court of law, but that in their consideration we should act more as a court of equity and judge from that standpoint in granting pensions.

Here is the case of a man who was badly wounded and who was connected with other men in the full possession of all their muscular powers in the performance of a certain duty. Those who were not wounded were able to take care of themselves when the accident occurred, and though there were several engaged at the same time this man was killed all but he escaped.

It is a fair conclusion, therefore, that this man, if he had been able-bodied, would also have been saved. Now, if that is the fact, his death is attributable to the wounds received in the service, and it seems to me we should at least give the doubt in favor of the party applying for the pension. If there is any doubt upon the subject it should be resolved in favor of the individual who is to be the recipient. We should not judge these cases, as I have said, upon strict rules of law, as the gentleman from Alabama has indicated.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Of course if they were judged by the strict rules of law there would be no necessity for this application in behalf of his widow. But all I desired to do was to call the attention of this House to the fact that you are extending your pension laws.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That is what we came here for.

I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

ALEXANDER SAINT BERNARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4790) granting a pension to Alexander Saint Bernard.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Alexander Saint Bernard, late pilot on the steamer Michigan, United States Navy, and pay him a pension, from and after the passage of this act.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4790) granting a pension to Alexander Saint Bernard, report:

Alexander Saint Bernard, of Saint Clair, Mich., now 75 years of age, was appointed pilot on the steamer Michigan, United States Navy, in October, 1844, and served as such until July 4, 1868, when he was mustered out by reason of the ship going out of commission. The steamer Michigan during said time cruised on Lakes Erie, Saint Clair, Huron, Michigan, Superior, and the navigable waters connecting the same. Alexander Saint Bernard during that period, embracing nearly twenty-four years' consecutive service, necessarily suffered many hardships, privations, and exposures to storms incident to the performance of his duty as pilot, which have finally culminated in a general impairment of his health, rendering him incapable of earning his livelihood by any avocation open to him. It is shown that during his whole period of service he was always willing, faithful, and reliable. Charles Green, first lieutenant, says:

"I have ever found you cautious, prudent, and intelligent, as well as ready and willing in the discharge of all the duties imposed on you, whether as pilot or otherwise, and in your correct moral deportment and strict integrity you have my high esteem."

His commander, Joseph Lanman, says:

"He has at all times merited and received the entire approbation of the commander of the Michigan."

J. R. McKinley, afterward commander, says:

"Being fully aware of your superior qualifications in the capacity you have so long and faithfully served the Government, I would gladly aid you."

It appears that during the war of the rebellion, while still attached to the ship, he was detailed on recruiting service for the United States Navy, both at Chicago and Detroit, and was successful in enlisting recruits for the naval service.

In relation to his present disability and the incurrence thereof, Dr. A. L. Padfield testifies as follows:

"I am a practicing physician and surgeon, residing in the city of Saint Clair; have known Alexander Saint Bernard for twenty years; have been his family physician for the past sixteen years, since his return from the Government service; have known him to be unable to perform but little of manual labor, owing principally to the weakness of the muscles of the upper extremities on the right side and the lower extremities on the left side of the body, and has evident increasing symptoms of paralysis in the upper right extremity, as, in my opinion, was produced by exposure and fatigue in the Government service while under duty on the steamer Michigan."

In view of the long, faithful, and satisfactory service during the best part of his life, and in view of his present age, poverty, and paralytic state, resulting from said service, your committee recommend the passage of the bill with this amendment: Add at the end of the bill the words "at the rate of $15 per month."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM ROBINSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1502) granting a pension to William Robinson.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Wiliam Robinson, late a scout in the United States Army.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred bill H. R. 1502, beg leave to make the following report:

This claim for pension is based on military service rendered the Government as a scout and guide for the United States Army in the years 1863 and 1864. Claimant was first employed under General Julius White, from the 5th day of September to the 17th day of November, 1863. He was next employed under General Phil. Sheridan from the 15th day of December, 1863, to the 17th day of January, 1864, at which latter date Col. James T. Shelley, of the Fifth Tennessee Infantry, assumed command of the post at Loudon, Tenn., and claimant continued to serve under him until the 4th day of April, 1864. Colonel Gibson, of the Second Ohio Heavy Artillery, succeeded Colonel Shelley in command of that post, and claimant served under Colonel Gibson from the 10th day of April to the 12th day of June, 1864, at which date Col. M. L. Patterson, Fourth Tennessee Infantry, relieved Colonel Gibson, and claimant continued to serve in the same capacity under Colonel Patterson until October 28, 1864. It will thus be seen that he served in the capacity as scout for more than one year, and the evidence shows that he was subject to orders and military regulations and discipline the same as if he had been an enlisted man. That he strictly obeyed and faithfully executed orders is also clearly shown.

And General Julius White explicitly testifies that, by virtue of authority from his superior officers, he employed claimant as a scout and guide, and expressly agreed that his pay should be that of a captain of cavalry. Still the records of the War and Treasury Departments show that he has been paid but the trifling sum of $500 for more than twelve months' arduous and dangerous service.

The testimony shows that he was recognized as ranking with a captain of cavalry, and that as such detachments and scouting forces were required to report to him and made subject to his orders in their movements. The testimony of General White, under whom he was first employed, supported and fully corroborated by General Burnside, and that of Colonels Byrd, Shelley, Patterson, and a large number of other officers, soldiers, and citizens, clearly shows that his services were important and valuable to the military service and movements of the Federal Army.

The Secretary of War and Third Auditor of the Treasury, in reporting on his military service, likewise bear testimony to its efficiency and value. While engaged in this service he contracted sore eyes, that complaint being then epidemic among the soldiers of the command under which he was rendering service, from which he afterward became totally blind, and has remained in that condition ever since, without the remotest possibility or faintest hope of recovery of any degree of eyesight. He is stark blind, and the eyeballs gradually wasting away. In his memorial to Congress, asking to be placed on the pension-roll, among other things he says:

"That in the latter part of July, 1864, and while serving in the capacity of scout under Lieut. Col. M. L. Patterson, of the Fourth Tennessee Infantry, commanding United States forces at Loudon, Tenn., your petitioner contracted sore eyes, which disease was at that time prevalent among the soldiers of that military post and vicinity, and that he received treatment for said disease from Dr. A. W. Gregory, a civil physician residing in that locality. That in the latter part of September, or first of October, 1864, he was sent by the said Colonel Patterson on a very hazardous expedition to the southern part of Monroe County, Tennessee, and within the lines of the enemy, and while on that service was obliged to swim his horse across Little Tennessee River twice during one day, and that in so doing his person got very wet, which resulted in his contracting a bad cold, which, settling in his eyes, greatly aggravated the aforesaid disease of his eyes, which continued to grow worse up to the date of his quitting the service. That after the termination of his service as a scout your petitioner suffered continuously from said disease until the 10th day of August, 1866, when he suddenly experienced a severe pain in his eyes and became totally blind, which condition has continued up to the present time; and during said period of blindness he has not only been unable to perform any manual labor whatever, but his condition has required the constant aid and attendance of other persons."

These facts, as thus stated in his memorial, are all fully sustained by Drs. Gregory, Blair, and Harrison, so far as his disease of the eyes and the results therefrom are concerned, all of whom are reputable gentlemen and physicians of high standing. Dr. Gregory first treated him, and corroborates claimant's own statements in his memorial. Drs. Blair and Harrison also treated him and verify his own and Dr. Gregory's statements. Col. M. L. Patterson, under whose orders he was acting when attacked with sore eyes, and when he was compelled to swim the river on his horse and thus caught cold, corroborates and sustains his statements thoroughly. And his service, disease, and present condition are proven by many other witnesses, among whom are Col. R. K. Byrd, James T. Shelly, and other officers of the Army at the time, known to be good citizens and of high character.

In the opinion of your committee, claimant is as much entitled to a pension as if he had been regularly enlisted, enrolled, and mustered as a soldier. This committee can see no propriety in showing a distinction, based on the formalities of entering the military service, as between enlisted men and scouts. The latter service was concededly the most perilous of any.

We think pensions should be granted in meritorious cases, whether the claimant was an enlisted man, and mustered into military service, or a civilian employed by the proper authority to perform military service.

The basis of the pension should be the military service and disability incurred while in the discharge of duty in that service. In this case the proof is plenary and absolutely conclusive as to every necessary fact, as well as that the claimant is now old and in pinching financial circumstances. In consideration of the premises, your committee report back the bill and unanimously recommend its passage.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the evidence of these physicians, although relied on to prove the claim, is not set forth in this report of the committee. The conclusion at which the writer of the report has arrived is given, but upon what proof that conclusion is reached is not stated. What the physicians have testified in reference to this case is not given. Now, we could better determine whether or not the blindness of which this man is now suffering was caused from his service as a scout if we had the testimony of the physicians before us instead of the mere conclusions attained by the writer of the report.

I know enough about the proceedings in committees of this House to know that as a rule it is not possible for the whole committee, nor is it expected, that they would be able to look into the evidence. The cases are usually assigned to members, and the committee is necessarily compelled to take the opinion of the writer of the report as to the questions involved. In a report, however, where we are to rely upon the evidence of the physicians or others, that testimony, or its substance at least, ought to be set forth in the report. Certainly that evidence, or at least a portion of it, that part which bears upon the case, ought to be set out so that the House may judge as well as the man who writes the report as to whether or not the evidence sustains the conclusions. If there is any gentleman here who knows the facts as to how this evidence was gotten up, in what shape it came up, and how it was done, I take it it would be a much more satisfactory thing for the House to have it stated. This case I believe has never been before the Commissioner of Pensions.

It is a case which has come directly to Congress, and we all know how easy it is to get up ex parte affidavits to prove almost anything. If this man's blindness has been caused by his services as a scout he ought to be placed upon the pension-roll, and I say that it is the duty of Congress to put him there; but we ought to be satisfied before we do it in reference to the facts, for, sir, if he is put there on the pension-roll he will draw $72 a month. The highest pension is given to those who are totally blind, and it amounts to $72 a month. If we put this man there he will draw that rate of pension; but before doing so we ought to know what his physicians have testified; and so far as I have heard the report we have not had that testimony laid before us.

Mr. MATSON. Since the gentleman from Alabama, as the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, wields so free a lance of criticism against the reports of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I am sure he will not find fault with me if I refer to the fact that his committee came into this House within the last two weeks with a report only two lines long stating the committee recommended the passage of the accompanying bill. That was all there was in the report.

Now, I think the report in the pending case is ample and sufficient. It would be impossible for a committee to write out in a report all the testimony of witnesses in hæc verba, and if they were to do so I think the House would become weary of listening to its reading in detail. I have every confidence in the statement made here, although I am free to say I did not see these papers. The facts are stated as proved.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Not facts but conclusions are stated.

Mr. MATSON. The conclusions are stated there in accordance with the facts which were submitted to the committee. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, the criticisms of the gentleman on this report are not well taken. I am disposed to be friendly about these things, but I do not think criticisms ought to go too far. When the report pretty well exhausts the subject I think the House ought to be satisfied. That is my opinion about it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Of course I did not intend in any remarks I made to cast any reflection on the honorable gentleman or on any member of his committee, and if what I have said can be construed as doing so I will withdraw it.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH MINER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1077) granting a pension to Sarah Miner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah Miner, widow of Stephen B. Miner, formerly a master's mate on the United States Coast-Survey steamer Vixen.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. BAGLEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report:

Stephen B. Miner, husband of the petitioner, Sarah E. Miner, became connected with the United States Coast Survey some time during the year 1855, and while acting as executive officer of the steamer Hetzel the boiler exploded, and, being over it, he inhaled steam to that extent that it resulted in severe asthma, the accident causing the death of others. Commander Thomas S. Phelps, under whose command he served, states that he was informed that Mr. Miner's disease originated in the manner described, and he believes it was greatly aggravated by his duties in the Coast Survey and naval service, and the progress of said disease is shown as conclusive of the correctness of the statement.

The affidavit of James C. Abrams, an old acquaintance of Miner's, details the cause of the origin of the disease in the service, and his view is confirmed by the testimony of several physicians who treated him. Mr. Abrams's affidavit states that Miner was blown several feet into the air and came down in the débris, the deck and pilot-house being completely destroyed.

At the breaking out of the war Miner was first executive officer of the United States steamer Vixen, under the command of Lieut. Commander T. S. Phelps, of the United States Navy. The vessel was ordered to Throgg's Neck to guard the port of New York against contraband vessels passing in and out of the port. The captain was ordered to Washington soon after, and was absent several months, leaving Mr. Miner in command. The duty was arduous and required vigilant attention night and day, hailing and boarding vessels in all kinds of weather. The season was stormy, cold, and wet. The hardship brought on asthma in a severe form and a pulmonary attack from which no relief could be obtained. The ship was ordered to the coast of Virginia, and was kept in active service on the coast and rivers of Virginia, where the greatest vigilance was required to protect the people from depredations from the confederates, who were very active. They captured some $30,000 worth of property and repelled several attacks of the enemy's armed vessels, and received the thanks of the Secretary of the Navy for driving off the armed vessels Curlew and Winslow and for gallant and meritorious conduct.

The record of the service shows great activity on the part of Mr. Miner and his vessel on the York and James Rivers during the campaign of McClellan on the Peninsula. They were constantly intercepting boats and vessels and shelling troops on shore and receiving their fire in return. They succeeded in destroying much property and in capturing many prizes, and the service rendered is shown to have been most daring and effective, and exceedingly arduous.

Notwithstanding Mr. Miner's disabled condition, he remained true to his trust and bravely in the service until he resigned, in 1865. Ample testimony is given to show the existence of the disease while in the service, and that its progress was continuous until his death, which occurred in July, 1867. The evidence of attending physicians and friends is given to substantiate the facts stated.

Dr. I. T. Dana, of Portland, Me., testifies that Miner first came under his observation and care November, 1863, treating him about seven months; that he was suffering from chronic bronchitis and asthma, with marked consumptive tendency; saw him in October, 1864, when his disease became more developed in the form of consumption.

Dr. J. F. Gray, of New York, testifies that he treated him for some years before his death for tuberculose consumption.

Dr. Wheeler, of Hudson, N. Y., certifies that he attended him from April 27, 1867, until his death, in July, 1867, from consumption.

Lucius Moore and James Clark, reliable and trustworthy citizens of Hudson, N. Y., testify to their acquaintance with Miner prior to his resignation in 1865, and that when he came home he was suffering severely with the asthma and disease of his lungs, which terminated in death.

The several affiants, all of whom seem to be familiar with the facts in the case, agree that the disability of which the claimant's husband died originated in the service of the United States.

The general laws do not provide pensions for those in the Coast Survey service, although they may have incurred disability therein, and while under the direct orders of the Navy Department during the war, for the reason that they were not regularly enrolled, yet where actual service was rendered, encountering dangers, hardships, and sacrifices the same as those who were enrolled, it seems but just that they should be equally provided for.

The widow, who is a lady highly esteemed in the community in which she lives, is in straitened circumstances, and, believing that her husband's life was sacrificed in the service of his Government, appeals to it for aid, trusting it will not be in vain.

The committee are of the opinion, after examining all the points in the case, that it is a suitable one for a pension, and recommend the passage of H. R. 1077.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EMMA A. PORCH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3294) granting a pension to Emma A. Porch.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Emma A. Porch, of Cole County, Missouri, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and that she be paid at the rate of $20 per month."

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. FYAN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported as follows:

They have had same under consideration; that the bill in substance has been pending in Congress for several years. A favorable report in the case was made in the Forty-sixth Congress, and the bill passed the House.

Again in the Forty-seventh Congress the report of the Forty-sixth Congress was adopted, and the bill again passed the House.

The committee now adopt the report made in the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses, as follows:

"This committee, to whom was referred the bill of the House No. 4877, have considered the same, and finding the facts correctly reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the Forty-sixth Congress, adopt said report, which shows:

"'That the committee find that Mrs. Porch, during the war, was employed by the military authorities of the Federal Army as dispatch-bearer and spy; that in this capacity she was most active, and rendered important and valuable service to the Army in the Department of Missouri. The Government recognized these services, and Congress, by special act approved June 14, 1878, paid her a moderate compensation therefor after many years of impatient waiting. The evidence submitted to the committee, from her neighbors, the county officials, and her attending physicians abundantly establishes the fact that when she entered into the military service she was and had always been possessed of a robust constitution and perfect health; that during her said military service she was much exposed to hunger, cold and rain; that since the war her physical strength and health have been greatly impaired, and have continued to decline, until a few years ago she was stricken with paralysis, which had partially destroyed the use of one side. She is now quite nigh helpless and unable to work, and is a subject of charity, being without any property of consequence, and in constant need of medicine and medical treatment.

"'Your committee think her case appeals most strongly to the Government which she served with such heroic spirit and fortitude in the day of its need to help her now in her infirmity resulting from military services. No good reason is apparent for her exclusion from the bounty of the Government because she was not an enlisted soldier. Her sex prevented the enlistment, but it enabled her to gain access to the enemy, to pass safely by and through their lines, and thereby to render to the Government a service as valuable as the soldier who bore a musket.'"

It is shown by communications from worthy and responsible citizens, neighbors of the claimant, that her condition is now more helpless than heretofore.

Your committee therefore recommend the bill be amended by striking out the words "subject to provisions and limitations of the pension laws," and adding to said bill the words "and that she be paid at rate of twenty dollars per month," and that the bill as amended do pass.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN D. RICKARDS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2348) granting a pension to John D. Rickards.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John D. Rickards, late a private in Company A, Sixty-ninth Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. FYAN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report:

That John D. Rickards was a soldier in Company A, Sixty-ninth Regiment Missouri Enrolled Militia, and that on the 23d day of August, 1862, his company was ordered to and did attack a camp of confederate soldiers, commanded by Col. Joseph Porter, and that said Rickards was shot through the body and taken prisoner. The bullet entered at the left of the vertebra above the last false rib, between it and the true rib, passing through the serratus corticus, and was extracted from the external oblique muscle.

That he was wounded in action as mentioned is sworn to by Thomas Helms and Richard Greene, members of the same company and regiment, who knew the fact of their own personal knowledge.

The same fact is established by the sworn statement of G. S. Kendrick, captain in the confederate army, who took said Rickards prisoner. Dr. A. M. Raines swears he was called upon on the 24th day of August, 1862, to dress a gunshot wound of the character described, and that Rickards was under his treatment five or six weeks. Dr. Raines further swears that Rickards is now greatly disabled for the performance of manual labor. John D. Rickards was examined by D. V. Vansyckel, examining surgeon, who reports him to have received a wound such as before described, and who further reports that the ball must have passed very near to the spleen, between it and the diaphragm, and that his injury is of third grade.

Rickards made application for pension, but it was rejected because he was in the militia, and not in the United States service. The only way in which he can be pensioned under existing laws is by act of Congress, and we do therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

TEMPLE GOLDEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5070) granting a pension to Temple Golden.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Temple Golden, late a private in Company K, Seventy-sixth Regiment Missouri State Militia, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. FYAN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report:

That Temple Golden was a private in Company K, Seventy-sixth Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia, and that while on duty as guard on the 9th day of March, 1863, he was wounded by gunshot wound in the left leg, inflicted by the enemy. This is testified to by James H. Crabtree, who was on duty at the same time and who saw the enemy shoot Golden, assisted in carrying him off the field, and saw his leg amputated. The same facts substantially are sworn to by W. K. Testerman, from his own personal knowledge and observation.

Dr. Lewis Wills, of Neosho, Mo., a highly reputable physician and surgeon, corroborates the evidence of above-named parties by swearing that in 1863—and he thinks in March of that year—Temple Golden was brought to town of Neosho by the Union troops, with a gunshot wound in left thigh, about five inches above the knee; that the bone was shattered into fragments in the knee-joint; the flesh was bruised and lacerated in a horrible manner, with dirt and small gravel sticking to it, and the upper fragment of the femur looked as if it had been driven into the ground. The doctor amputated limb about the middle of the thigh.

Under the laws as framed this applicant could not receive pension; but he was a soldier, wounded while on duty in the service of his Government, and there is no reason why he should not receive the same pension granted to United States soldiers wounded in like manner.

Your committee therefore recommend passage of bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, we seem to be getting a good many of the Missouri militia on the pension-roll, and I wish to make one or two inquiries before we pass upon this case. I should like to know in what battle this man was wounded. Can any gentleman on the committee tell us?

Mr. ROSECRANS. I should be glad to say a word in respect to these cases of the Missouri State militia. I was the department commander in 1864. That department was stripped in the spring of that year of almost all of the volunteer troops of the State, and all of the regular troops except one battalion. The defense of that department depended on this Missouri State militia. Some of them had been mustered into the service at an earlier day. They served the same purpose almost as volunteer troops.

Others were enlisted by the authority of the Secretary of War under my supervision for one year for the defense of that department, and they performed duty during 1864. When Missouri was invaded by General Price they had a number of combats. And besides that the expectation of that invasion had been diffused through the State of Missouri in March. I had information of that fact from the Order of American Knights. The new commander in the North who succeeded Wright delivered an address at a meeting of the conclave at Sandwich, over in Canada, as early as February, and I knew all about that. I knew the State was to be invaded and the expectation was that Missouri, Ohio, and Pennsylvania would be invaded about the 1st of July. But I arrested forty-two of the conspirators in Missouri and put them in prison and that put a stop to the invasion of Missouri till September. But when September came we were obliged to muster everything we could and get troops from everywhere; and I got authority from the Secretary of War to muster in State militia for one year. That is the way so many Missourians got into the service of the United States. It was owing to the invasion and disturbance which were outliers of the invasion that they had so many combats, small and great.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I wish to ask the gentleman from California a question if he will allow me.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Certainly.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman inform us why it happened these companies were not mustered into the United States service as well as the Missouri State militia?

Mr. ROSECRANS. Because under the direction of the Secretary of War they were to do duty in the State of Missouri only. They were specials.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Not expected to go out of the State?

Mr. ROSECRANS. The understanding was they were mustered for State defense. The object in mustering them in was to enable the Government to pay them while serving in Missouri.

Mr. CUTCHEON. And I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions why it would not be advisable to have a general law to cover these cases where troops served as a State militia under orders of the Secretary of War?

Mr. MATSON. There was a general law which expired in 1874 or 1878—I do not remember the exact date. That law provided that all who belonged to these various classes of Missouri militia who were recognized as United States soldiers except in the mere name should be pensioned as other soldiers. They had to file their claims within a given time. This man did not file his claim.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Why would it not be advisable to revive that law?

Mr. MATSON. Because there are but a few scattering claims which we can take care of here.

Mr. CUTCHEON. There were a few the last night we were considering pension cases and there were some more to-night.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I can not give the committee any information about the facts of this particular case, but I can answer the question of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] I think satisfactorily, although the ground has been pretty well covered by the gentleman from California. But the gentleman from Alabama should appreciate the fact that Missouri was a battle-ground from very early in 1861 till the close of the war, from the Iowa line to the Arkansas border, and there were engagements between hostile forces within a few miles of the Iowa line every few months—almost every few weeks—during the entire period of the war.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I should like to ask the gentleman from Missouri if all these engagements were not distinguished by some local names? If they were battles or skirmishes they must have been known by some name.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. A great many of them are known by name and date, like the battle of Kirksdale and the battle of the Des Moines River, and several engagements of that kind that occurred very near the line. But a great many were simply running fights between these forces that were roaming over the State. As the gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS] well knows, the officer whose name is mentioned in the report just read, Colonel Porter, who lived in one of the northern counties of the State up to the time of his death, was in that part of the State of Missouri every season with his regiment, and there were sometimes from three to ten thousand men after him.

Mr. ROSECRANS. And I will say more; so thoroughly was the strip of country next the State of Kansas border desolated that sitting on my horse I counted from one elevation forty double stacks of chimneys where the houses had been burned away as one of the marks of the desolation resulting from the constant warfare.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. That was in the portion of the State covered by the famous order No. 11.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I will ask the gentleman from California whether he is not speaking of a time prior to 1863?

Mr. ROSECRANS. Eighteen hundred and sixty-four is the time I alluded to when I observed the desolation. Of course a great deal of that desolation had occurred previously.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Was it not in 1861 and 1862 that the fighting occurred there?

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ERMENTROUT). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEELE. The conversation of the gentlemen at the other side of the Hall is carried on in so low a tone that we do not hear a word that is said.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I am not prepared to give the gentleman from Alabama the information he asks as to the number of troops enlisted in the State of Missouri who served in the Federal Army, but there were several different classes of soldiers. There were the regular soldiers, a large number of regiments which were mustered at once into the Federal service. Then there was what was known as the Missouri enrolled militia, which was first organized under the State law and afterward mustered into the Federal service. Then there was the Missouri State militia. A large number of these forces were from time to time under the command of regular Federal officers who were in command in the State, and they were held as a reserved force. In nearly all the engagements that occurred in the State they were commanded by regular Federal officers and constituted a part of their command.

Mr. ROSECRANS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will make a little explanation right here. All the Missouri enrolled militia were organized under the governor of the State; but he was in constant communication with the department commander of the State of Missouri, and accounts were kept with the Government. Then the State militia was the militia which I had mustered into the service in 1864. Of these three classes two were always in the Federal service; that is, the governor of the State organized them, but they were under Federal direction.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I will state further to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] that no better service was ever performed by any troops than the service performed by these Missouri troops, for they held that State and relieved a large number of Federal soldiers from duty there so that they could be put into active service in the field.

If it is any satisfaction now to the gentleman from Alabama—I do not know that it was at the time; I am sure it was not to me—I will tell him that had it not been for this large State force, General Price, when he reached the Missouri River, never would have stopped until he reached the Iowa State line. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to make one or two remarks about this report, but I am afraid if I do so my friend here from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] will accuse me of criticising too severely the reports of his committee.

A MEMBER. He can jump on some of your reports. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Here is a man who it is said belonged to the Missouri militia. The report of the committee says that he was wounded in some engagement that has no name and it does not tell us where that engagement took place, it does not tell us in what battle the wound was received. It seems to me that if it was not in some little neighborhood skirmish there, in some neighborhood broil between citizens, if it was in a regular engagement with the enemy, they would have been able at least to tell us where and in what engagement the man was wounded.

I do not suppose this Government intends to pension everybody that was hurt in Missouri during the war, whether he belonged to the militia or not. While I am willing to vote pensions to all the soldiers in the Federal service who were wounded, or who contracted disease during the late war, I certainly am not willing to vote a pension to every man in Missouri who might have got hurt in some neighborhood broil there during that war.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. The word "enemy" has a technical meaning in military phrase, has it not?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It has a technical meaning, but it may not have been used in its technical sense here. This may have been merely a neighborhood enemy.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] seems to find fault with this report because it does not name the battle in which this casualty occurred. I think there are a great many gentlemen on this floor who can assure the gentleman that it did not take very much of an engagement sometimes to kill a man, or very much of an engagement to wound a man. Sometimes a picket on the outposts all alone met his fate. Sometimes an advance guard might be passing along the highway and be fired on from the roadside. No name was ever given to the place, but he died just the same, and was just as dead as if he had been killed at Chancellorsville or in the Wilderness; or if he was wounded, he was just as severely and effectually wounded as though he had been wounded at Gettysburg.

But that is not all. When we send a case of this kind to the Committee on Invalid Pensions we treat it, I think, something in the same way as a case is treated that is sent out of court to a special jury to find the facts of the case. When the verdict comes in I think we should give it full faith and credit unless we see something on the face of the report to throw doubt and discredit upon it.

I see by reference to this report that it says:

Timothy Golden was a private in Company K, Seventy-sixth Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia, and while on duty as guard on the 9th day of March, 1863, he was wounded by a gunshot wound in the left leg inflicted by the enemy.

Then the report goes on to state the proofs which have been presented.

Now, when the Committee on Invalid Pensions brings in this report and assures us that this man was a regularly enrolled soldier, and that he was wounded while on duty as a guard, we should accept that report unless we see some good reason for not accepting it. Had this man been in the regular service of the United States and this same sort of proof had been presented there would have been no question but what he would be entitled to a pension; he was wounded in the service, in the line of his duty, and is suffering from that disability. The simple fact that he was an enrolled soldier in the militia of the State of Missouri rather than in the regular service of the United States ought not to make a bit of difference in our action upon the case.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that a man wounded in a "neighborhood broil," to use the language of my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] is hurt just as much as if wounded in a regular battle. The only question that deserves consideration from this House in such a case as this is whether the man was acting in concert with the United States forces, whether when he was wounded he was fighting for the Union.

Mr. Chairman, I have learned from my distinguished friend from Alabama a valuable lesson. In one of his lectures before our committee—and I am telling no secrets—he was talking about the Indian wars, the Indian "disturbances," as they were called in history; and he explained most beautifully and eloquently—I shall remember his remarks until my dying day, for they converted me right there—that the brave soldiers who fought the Indians, because Indians could fight and kill, deserved pensions just as much as though they had been engaged in a regular war. Having been convinced by his argument, I intend to vote for his bill, when it comes before us, upon its merits.

I happen to know something of cases parallel to the one now before us. My own native State was a scene of war from border to border, from the Ohio to the Cumberland. There was scarcely a day—certainly not a week—when some gallant men, representing on the one side the "lost cause" and on the other the cause of the Union (for we had good men and true on both sides), met and fought and were killed or wounded. Those who fought under those circumstances for the confederate government ought to be pensioned by that government if it were in existence, and those who fought for the Union ought to be pensioned, every man of them, by the Government of the United States.

All Missouri was a battlefield at that time, as all Kentucky was. All Missouri was drenched in blood, as all Kentucky was. Men were there contending every day and hour, to the very death, for the supremacy of the Union on the one side and the supremacy of the confederacy on the other. There were true and brave and noble men on both sides. When you talk about "neighborhood broils" I know something about that matter. As brave men as ever lived stood in front of the enemy in Kentucky, as I presume they did in Missouri. Sometimes they were under the guidance of Union officers and sometimes they fought by themselves for the liberty of the nation, for the honor and glory of the old Government, for the perpetuity of the Union. They triumphed. We enjoy the blessings for which they fought. We rejoice in the fruits of their success. And shall we say that a poor fellow is to receive no pension because he was wounded in a little "neighborhood fight," when in parts of the country like Kentucky and Missouri such fights were going on constantly, and in those fights brave men were standing up for the Union? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

There was no objection.

MRS. MARY J. STOTTS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5069) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary J. Stotts.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Mary J. Stotts, widow of Green C. Stotts, late captain of Company D, Seventy-sixth Missouri Militia, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill No. 5069, state they have examined the same, and make the following report:

That in November, 1862, Green C. Stotts was commissioned as captain of Company D, Seventy-sixth Regiment Missouri Enrolled Militia.

That in April, 1863, they were mustered into and constituted Company C, Seventh Provisional Missouri Militia, and still later he and his company were mustered into and constituted Company C, Fifteenth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Cavalry.

That Captain Stotts was mustered out of service of United States July 1, 1865, on individual muster-roll.

He died November 5, 1876, and on 20th day of November, 1878, Mary J. Stotts, widow, made application for pension because her husband died of disease contracted while he was captain of Company C, Fifteenth Missouri Volunteer Cavalry. Her application was rejected July 9, 1883, as stated by the Commissioner of Pensions—

"Upon the ground that her husband's fatal disease was contracted while he was a member of Company D, Seventy-sixth Missouri Enrolled Militia, prior to being mustered into the United States service in the Fifteenth Missouri Volunteer Cavalry.

"That her husband was a member of an organization organized under the laws of the State of Missouri, and that as his fatal disease had its origin during said service, under the provisions of the pension law neither he himself nor his heirs have title to pension for disease or death contracted in or resulting from said service.

"That her claim is one for which the general pension law makes no provision, being barred under paragraph 3, section 4693 of the Revised Statutes, but is one which is properly referable to Congress for special action."

Your committee might be content to base their report solely on the above findings of the Commissioner, who, after a careful examination of the testimony, finds that said Stotts contracted the fatal disease while captain of Company D, Seventy-sixth Missouri Enrolled Militia, but deem it more satisfactory to call attention to a few of the facts in evidence in this case, which go to show it a peculiarly deserving one.

According to the evidence of reliable and trustworthy witnesses, Capt. Green C. Stotts and his company, D, Seventy-sixth Missouri Enrolled Militia, being in active service, were ordered, November, 1862, to Bower's Mill, Mo.; that they were without tents or necessary clothing. They were all necessarily greatly exposed. About the 15th of December, 1862, Captain Stotts was taken with a violent cold, and was in a precarious condition and unfit for duty until April or May, 1863. This is sworn to by the first lieutenant of the company and Dr. Andrew Wilson, assistant surgeon of the regiment, who waited on him.

Dr. Wilson also swears that he treated him from the time mentioned until June, 1863, for bronchitis; that he was of a scrofulous constitution, and consequently very susceptible to the influence of cold and exposure. It is in evidence that he continued to labor under disability to a greater or less extent from December, 1862, until, in 1864, on the raid of confederate General Sterling Price through Missouri, he was much worse, at which time he was attended by Dr. King, surgeon Fifteenth Missouri Volunteer Cavalry, who was dead at time of application by widow.

Dr. Harvey, a prominent physician of Lawrence County, Missouri, swears he was family physician for Captain Stotts and family from 1863 up to time of death of said Stotts. That he was first called to wait on Captain Stotts in 1863, and found him affected with a skin disease which developed into scrofula. That it would break out on his hands and other parts of his body, which grew worse as time progressed, and was much aggravated by his exposure in the service. That he died from this, it eventually affecting his lungs, causing tubercles.

There is no question, under the evidence, that Captain Stotts was a remarkably healthy, robust man before entering the service.

We have only incorporated part of the evidence collated in the Pension Bureau, and which from the report of the Commissioner would have entitled his widow to pension if he had been a regular volunteer in United States Army instead of being in the militia. But both organizations were battling for the same cause—the preservation of the Union—and Captain Stotts was exposing himself as bravely and heroically, and certainly as patriotically, as if he had been uniformed in comfortable clothing or sheltered in a warm tent.

We therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I wish to inquire why a pension could not be obtained in this case under the law?

Mr. MATSON. The report explains the reason very fully. This man was a member of Company D, Seventy-sixth Regiment Missouri Enrolled Militia, and subsequently was mustered into the service of the United States as a captain of Company C, Fifteenth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Cavalry. In the opinion of the committee he died of disease contracted in the service; but the Pension Office, upon the evidence, decided that the disease was contracted when he was serving in the militia and before he was mustered into the United States service.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MRS. SUSAN J. M'KENNEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5675) granting a pension to Mrs. Susan J. McKenney.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, directed to place the name of Mrs. Susan J. McKenney, of Belfast, Waldo County,

Maine, on the pension-roll of the United States, at the rate of $8 per month, from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3224) granting a pension to Mrs. C. O. McKenney, having had the same under consideration, make the following report:

Susan J. McKenney, of Belfast, Waldo County, Maine, is the widow of the late Charles O. McKenney, of said Belfast, who died the 8th day of January, 1884. The deceased was duly appointed a special agent by the provost-marshal for the fifth district of the State of Maine, about October 15, 1863, and he performed the duties of said office faithfully until April 26, 1865, when he was honorably discharged.

On or about June 20, 1864, during his service as such special agent, while in the line of his duty and in an attempt to arrest a deserter, pursuant to an order from the provost-marshal, he was shot by the said deserter and severely wounded. The shots were fired from a revolver; one bullet entered his back, passed through his body, and lodged under his right arm; two bullets passed through his left arm; and still another hit and wounded him in the left thigh.

Although he received skillful medical treatment immediately after being shot, he was confined to his house for upward of fifty days, and for more than a year he was incapacitated from performing any labor. He was never a well man subsequently, and always suffered severely from his injuries. He was unable ever afterward to do more than half the work a person of ordinary health could perform, and he could do that much only with great pain and suffering. He could not labor continously at any kind of work for any considerable length of time after being shot, and for several years last past he has been growing worse on account of his injuries, until on the 8th day of January, 1884, since the beginning of the present session, as already stated, he died.

Without doubt his death was caused by the shooting above-mentioned. But there is no law by which the said McKenney, in his lifetime, or his widow since his decease, might draw a pension.

Your committee are of the opinion that the case is meritorious, and that his widow, left in poverty, ought to receive a pension by special act of Congress.

We therefore report the accompanying bill to the House as a substitute for the one referred to your committee, with the recommendation that it pass.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. In this case we have one of those poor fellows described to-day by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] who were "homesick," who having left mothers or wives or sweethearts at home, deserted in order to go back to see them. Then we have also in this case a fellow who was a sort of provost-marshal, a man who staid at home and got some position which would keep him out of the war, and this was a very good place to keep out of the war. One of the agents of the provost-marshal was sent out to arrest this poor fellow who had been at "the front," and in attempting to arrest him this assistant of the provost-marshal was shot. You have all said to-day by your action that desertion was honorable because you have removed the charge from the records of those against whom it was placed.

Mr. WOLFORD. No; only that it was pardonable.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. That it was pardonable, at least. I have as much respect—I will not say that, Mr. Chairman, but I will say that I have not much faith in these provost-marshals or in their subs who staid at home, and tried to put everybody else into the service but themselves and their friends. I supposed it was at the North as it was at the South in my country during the war. We had these gentry down there who kept themselves away from the bullets of our friends at the North. They staid back at home seeking those positions in order that they might keep out of harm's way, but trying to drive everybody else, all of the poor men of that country to the front. I have but little sympathy with one of these fellows who happened to get shot, and I do not feel like stretching the pension laws in order to get him on the pension-roll. I am earnest in my opposition to this bill. I do not think it ought to pass.

I do not think these provost-marshals, particularly away back in Maine—because he was there living away from the enemy—deserve much sympathy from us.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. You say you are in earnest about this bill?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Yes; I am.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Then you were joking about all the other bills. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Not joking exactly, but only calling your attention to them.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word in relation to this bill. Maine is a long way from the State represented by my friend from Alabama, but it is a good deal nearer the Canada line, and during the rebellion we had now and then a man whose business called him over the line most of the time while the drafts were pending. Like Artemus Ward, we had men who were willing to sacrifice their wives' first cousins and their wives' second cousins, and in fact all their wives' relations, provided they themselves could escape the draft which they sometimes attempted by going near to or over the line. We therefore were obliged to employ provost-marshals, deputy provost-marshals, and enrolling officers in order to take care of the men who deserted the Army in the field, and those at home also who attempted to escape the draft.

We likewise had to employ special agents to assist the provost-marshals in the performance of their duties, and this poor fellow, now dead and gone, was one of these special agents. Had he been a provost-marshal, or a deputy provost-marshal, or an enrolling officer, under the provisions of the Revised Statutes of the United States, section 4693, clause 5, the pension would have been granted to him twenty years ago. The general pension laws apply only to provost-marshals, deputy provost-marshals, and enrolling officers. As a special agent McKenney could not be pensioned under the general law, although he performed precisely the same duties as were imposed on provost-marshals and their deputies. While in the proper discharge of his duty he was shot almost to death by a deserter, and the wounds he then received finally caused his death January 8 of the present year.

The deceased is not here asking for a pension, but his widow, now an old lady in destitute circumstances, does pray for a pension on account of the loss of her husband, who died from wounds received while in the service of his country. She asks for a pension by reason of those four bullets shot into her husband's body, which ultimately caused his death, and I do believe that she is as much entitled to receive a pension as any case we have passed upon favorably here to-night.

I may say, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee on Invalid Pensions were unanimous in reporting this bill. The woman is aged and needy, and she can not get a pension except by special act of Congress. The pending bill proposes to give her only $8 a month.

Her husband in trying to arrest a deserter and send him to the front in order to help the brave men already there to put down the rebellion was doing his country good service, just as much as though he had been fighting the enemy at the front himself.

As I have already remarked, the poor man is not here asking this pension for himself—although if he were living and were here asking for it I would cheerfully vote to grant it; and I am sorry he did not get it during his lifetime—but his widow, whose husband sacrificed his life for the benefit of the country, just as much as though he had been shot and killed south of Mason and Dixon's line, is here, and the favorable report of the committee in her behalf I hope will be sustained by the Committee of the Whole and the bill laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that my colleague who introduced this bill is not present this evening to speak in its behalf. I have not myself that familiarity with the details of this case which I would like to have in order to present it fairly and fully before this committee. But I do desire to say that it seems to me entirely obvious that it is a case falling directly within the limits which have been established by Congress many times in the granting of pensions outside of the strict letter of the law. What are the circumstances surrounding it? Here was a case in brief in which an agent of the United States Government, performing a military service for the Government, was practically brought to his death while in the performance of that duty, a duty connected directly with the then existing war. There is no question, sir, I take it, if this man had been a commissioned officer of the Army or an enlisted private, and had met his fate in the way stated in the evidence presented before the committee, that he would have been entitled to a pension under the law; and, as I understand it, the very object of this legislation, which Congress is called upon from time to time to enact, is to provide for this class of cases which do not come technically within the strict limits of the law.

Now, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] has referred to the fact that the State of Maine is or was a long way from the front. That, Mr. Chairman, is entirely true, in a geographical sense. But it may also be said, and it ought to be said in that connection, that it was not so far from the front but that it sent seventy-odd thousand of the best and bravest of its sons to carry our flag forward on the battlefields of the Republic.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Certainly.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I am entirely aware of the fact stated by the gentleman from Maine; and I said not a word against the brave soldiers that went to the front from that State.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I trust the gentleman would not do so. I was simply vindicating my State from the reflection that might seem to be implied in his remarks.

I think, sir, that a State of this Union, situated, as the gentleman from Alabama has said, so far from the scene of strife as the State of Maine; so distant that its citizens might have felt somewhat exempt or removed from the exciting influences of that great conflict, and yet which in the face of that fact can show upon the records of this country that she sent to the front during the continuance of the rebellion no less than one man out of every nine of its entire inhabitants, has no reason to make any apology for those who, whether in the direct military line or in auxiliary efforts to suppress the rebellion, did meet with disaster or injury in their patriotic efforts when they come to this House and ask for relief.

Mr. Chairman, there is no question that this man was wounded unto practically his death in endeavoring to secure the objects for which the war was being prosecuted. He was shot by a deserter whom he was endeavoring to arrest. I can think of no sympathy whatever that can go out from this House toward the deserter who committed homicide in his endeavor to escape from the performance of his duty. But this man was in the performance of his duty; he was shot to death, and his widow asks this little pittance of relief at the hands of the Government. I trust that the House will not refuse it.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a very brief suggestion, and in doing so I mean no disrespect to any member, for under some circumstances I would enjoy all of this eloquence. But I want to suggest that we do less talking and more voting. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question was taken.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Let us have a division.

The committee divided; and the Chair announced the vote as—ayes, 50, noes none.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. One more.

The CHAIRMAN. Ayes 51, noes none.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I think the Chair has made a miscount. I voted in the negative.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs the gentleman's pardon. The Chair understood the gentleman from Alabama to say "one more," and as there were none voting in the negative the Chair counted him in the affirmative. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I vote "no."

So (there being no further count demanded) the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH A. SCOTT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2670) granting a pension to Sarah A. Scott, widow of John D. Scott, deceased, late first lieutenant of Company H, First Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah A. Scott, widow of John D. Scott, deceased, late first lieutenant of Company H, First Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2670) granting a pension to Sarah A. Scott, widow of John D. Scott, first lieutenant of Company H, First Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry, make the following report:

The committee find from official papers that John D. Scott was mustered into service September 6, 1861, as a private of Company H, First Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry, was promoted November 21, 1861, to first lieutenant, discharged September 10, 1862, died ——, 1866.

The committee find good evidence prior to his enlistment that he enjoyed excellent health, and from the evidence of his captain, W. S. Craft, and Joseph Nutt and others, that while in active service he contracted severe cold and rheumatism; that he suffered from pain in side and hip. This was shortly before his discharge.

Your committee also find from abundant evidence that immediately upon his return home, and up to the time of his death, his health was entirely broken and was altogether unlike his former self; that he continued to suffer from rheumatism contracted in service while in the Army.

Special examination was made by order of the Pension Office, July, 1882, which was very extended, and the evidence is very conflicting as to his habits of drinking. In his last illness he was visited by a physician but once, and that more than two weeks before his death. There was some evidence that he was then suffering from drink.

But inasmuch as he was a strong, healthy man before, and while in service that he contracted rheumatism, and that from the time of his discharge till his death he was a mere wreck, suffering from disease contracted while in the service, the committee conclude that he died from that disease.

The committee, in view of all these facts, report the bill back, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ISABEL CAMPBELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1117) granting a pension to Isabel Campbell.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Isabel Campbell, of Ashland County, Ohio, widow of James Campbell, late of Company K, Eighty-second Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred bill H. R. 1171, beg leave to submit the following report:

Claimant, Isabel Campbell, seeks to be placed on the pension-rolls as widow of James Campbell, late a corporal in Company K, Eighty-second Regiment of Ohio Volunteer Infantry. Her husband, James Campbell, volunteered in Ashland County, Ohio, November 17, 1861, for three years or during the war, and was duly mustered in as corporal of said company November 17, 1861. He served faithfully until February 24, 1863, when he was honorably discharged for disabilty. During his service and in the line of duty he contracted inflammation and hypertrophy of left kidney, chronic diarrhea, and piles. On the ground of the disability thus contracted he was granted a pension, which he continued to receive until his death, which occurred February 10, 1875.

It is clearly established by the evidence of numerous physicians that the diseases contracted in the service had become incurable, that he had become so weak and enfeebled by said diseases that his death was inevitable in a short time, when he was attacked with typhoid pneumonia, which diseases unitedly produced his death.

It is evident from the testimony that the condition of the soldier was beyond the reach of medical aid, and that he could not long survive from the effects of the diseases contracted in the Army and on account of which his pension was granted. Owing to his reduced condition, he had not the strength or vital power to resist the attack of pneumonia. Four credible physicians of skill and experience in their profession testify that the diseases contracted in the Army were the direct and immediate cause of the soldier's death; that those diseases produced the fever as they had produced the debility and constant suffering then rapidly and certainly hurrying him to the tomb.

In the Forty-seventh Congress, Dr. Rice, a member of this committee, a man of learning and skill in his profession as a physician, had this case under consideration to determine from the evidence whether the party died from the effects of the diseases contracted in the service or from other causes, and he indorsed the papers over his own signature as follows: "I would unhesitatingly recommend a favorable report in this case."

Owing to the sickness of Dr. Rice, a formal report of the case was not made to the House.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if these facts are as set forth in the report why it is that the Commissioner of Pensions did not himself grant the pension in this case?

Mr. MATSON. Because this man died of pneumonia.

Mr. STEELE. Then why should this woman be pensioned any more than the widow of the man that was killed on the railroad?

Mr. MATSON. For the simple reason that the disease that he had contracted in the Army had so reduced him in strength that it contributed really more toward his death than the pneumonia itself.

Mr. STEELE. If that is so, why then would not the Commissioner of Pensions give a pension?

Mr. MATSON. For the reason that the Commissioner found the immediate cause of death was pneumonia. In the case of the man killed in a railroad accident the wounds in no way contributed to his death. In this case the disease contracted in the Army so reduced the vitality of the man that he was unable to resist the attack of pneumonia.

Mr. STEELE. If the disease he died of was incident to the service, I do not see why he was not entitled to a pension.

Mr. MATSON. The disease of which he died was pneumonia, which was not contracted in the service.

Mr. STEELE. But if the disease he contracted in the service produced the emaciation and debility from which he suffered when attacked by pneumonia, would it not be held that his death was the effect of diseases contracted in the service?

Mr. MATSON. The committee were of opinion from the evidence, and Dr. Rice, an eminent member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions in a former Congress, also stated it as his judgment, from the evidence, that a pension ought to be granted. So far as the railroad case was concerned, we were unable to find there any connection between the death and the service. The man's death was entirely disconnected from the service. Here there is a connection. That is the difference.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANNA M. WEHE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1197) granting a pension to Anna M. Wehe.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Anna M. Wehe, of Newport, Ky., mother of the late William Wehe, of Company B, Eleventh Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. LE FEVRE) was read, as follows:

That the said Anna M. Wehe, who is now over 60 years old, is the mother of William Wehe, who enlisted as a private in Company B, Eleventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, at Piqua, Ohio, on the 20th day of June, 1861, to serve for three years or during the war. The affidavits and official papers before the committee show that the soldier, William Wehe, while in action with his company at the battle of Antietam, on the 17th day of September, 1862, received a gunshot wound in the right breast, by which he was disabled from further service, and was discharged for that reason on the 4th day of March, 1863. The wound was inflicted by a Minie-ball which entered the right breast, passed between the second and third ribs, and ranged obliquely backward through the upper part of the lung, seriously injuring that organ. This was followed by a severe cough, difficult breathing, shrinking of the muscles, and partial paralysis of the shoulder, arm, and hand.

He was granted a pension of $8 per month, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1863, the examining surgeon having certified that he was, by reason of the wound, "totally incapacitated for obtaining subsistence by manual labor."

The evidence shows that the soldier suffered severely and continuously from the effects of this wound as long as he lived. It never healed; he had a hectic fever and a severe consumptive cough, and, according to the evidence of a physician who attended him, he was in the last stages of consumption when he lost his life, as hereafter stated. He was never able to perform any manual labor after receiving the wound, although he was a part of the time after his discharge from the military service engaged in a light employment which enabled him to earn small wages.

On the 24th day of November, 1864, after a consultation with his physician, which satisfied him that he had but a short time to live, he started on a steamboat to go to Ripley, Ohio, about sixty miles from his home, and while on the way fell overboard and was drowned. It appears that he was, after being wounded, subject to frequent and violent fits of coughing, followed by great prostration and dizziness in the head, and the committee feel authorized to conclude from all the circumstances that the accident by which he lost his life was the result of one of these attacks. It is evident from the testimony of the witnesses, professional and non-professional, that he was at the time in a very feeble condition, and that under the most favorable circumstances his life could have been prolonged but for a very brief period.

Up to the time of his death his mother, Anna M. Wehe, was dependent upon him for a support, her husband being then, as now, an habitual and confirmed drunkard, and wholly refusing to make any provision for his wife and children. The husband and wife have been separated for several years. While in the Army, William Wehe divided his pay with his mother, and afterward, while receiving a pension from the Government, he also regularly contributed a part of that for her support. She is a cripple and in indigent circumstances; and the committee are of opinion that the relief asked for should be granted, and therefore report favorably on the bill and ask that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH BAUER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1203) granting a pension to Elizabeth Bauer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Bauer, widow of Michael Bauer, late a private in Company C, One hundred and sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. LE FEVRE) was read, as follows:

The petitioner filed a claim in the Pension Office April 4, 1864, in which she alleges that her husband, Michael Bauer, while serving in the command aforesaid, obtained a furlough to visit his family at Cincinnati, Ohio, and while en route to his home on the steamer Major Anderson he fell overboard and was drowned in the Ohio River; this on or about January 28, 1864. She declares her inability to show by the testimony of the company officers that the soldier was on furlough at the time of his death but filed in support of her allegation the affidavit of the orderly-sergeant of the company, from which it appears that the soldier did receive a furlough for ten or fifteen days while the command was stationed at Buck Lodge Station, Ky., and that it was reported afterward to the company that he was lost overboard while on his way home.

There is also on file with her papers in the Pension Office the sworn statement of one William Meyer to the effect that in January, 1864, while on board of the Major Anderson, en route from Louisville, Ky., to Cincinnati, he met petitioner's husband, an old acquaintance, who was then a private in Company C, One hundred and sixth Ohio Volunteers, and on his way home on furlough. About 5 o'clock p. m., while the soldier was resting on some cotton-bales, the boat was violently shaken by the ice running into it and breaking the rudder. A few minutes later affiant went to the cotton-bales on which he left the soldier resting just before the shock, but failed to find him. It was the impression of the affiant, as well as others who had observed the soldier on the cotton-bales, that he must have been thrown over into the river by the shock and drowned, although no one, in the confusion on board, noticed the fall. The witness also states that the soldier was in his sound mind, sober, and contented at the time, and had no reason to take his own life.

The Adjutant-General's report in the case shows that the soldier enlisted August 16, 1862, and was drowned January 28, 1864, while on his way home, on furlough.

The claim of the widow has been rejected by the Pension Office because the soldier was on furlough other than veteran or sick furlough at time of his death, and therefore not in line of duty.

The committee is satisfied that the soldier came to his death in the manner described by William Meyer, and that the petitioner, whose relationship to the soldier is fully established by the papers on file in the Pension Office, is entitled to relief, and therefore recommends the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GENERAL GEORGE J. STANNARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2839) to increase the pension of George J. Stannard, late a major-general of volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of George J. Stannard, late brevet major-general of volunteers, and who now holds pension certificate No. 79874 to the sum of $50 per month, from and after the passage of this act.

The following amendment was reported by the committee:

In line 7 strike out "$50" and insert "$40."

The report (by Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire) was read, as follows:

That Maj. Gen. George J. Stannard, of Burlington, Vt., was mustered into the service of the United States as lieutenant-colonel of the Second Regiment of Vermont Volunteers June 20, 1861; was promoted to be colonel of the Ninth Regiment Vermont Volunteers June 2, 1862; was made brigadier-general of the United States Volunteers March 11, 1863. For gallant and meritorious services in the attack upon the enemy's works at Fort Harrison, Va., he received the brevet of major-general of the United States volunteers, to date from October 28, 1864. He served with his regiment (Second Vermont) in Northeastern Virginia and on the Peninsula from June 24, 1861, to June 1, 1862, and in command of the Ninth Vermont Regiment in the defenses of Washington to July, 1862; at Winchester, Va., to September 2, 1862, and at Harper's Ferry, Va., to September, 15, 1862, when with his regiment he was captured by the enemy and paroled. He accompanied his command to Annapolis, Md., and thence, as a commander of a detachment of paroled prisoners, including his own regiment, to the fair grounds near Chicago, Ill., which command he held to November 22, 1862, and at Camp Douglass, Chicago, Ill., to March 19, 1863. He was in command of the second brigade, Abercrombie's division, Department of Washington, from April 21 to June 28, 1863, and of the third brigade, third division, First Army Corps, to July 3, 1863, on which date he was wounded in the right leg at the battle of Gettysburg. He was on sick leave from July 4 to September 8, 1863. Commanded the United States troops west of the Narrows, New York Harbor, to November 11, 1863, and United States forces in New York city and harbor to May, 1864. He also commanded the first brigade, second division, Eighteenth Army Corps, from May 17 to June 21, 1864, and the first division of the Eighteenth Army Corps to July 31, 1864. After which, on account of a gunshot wound in the left hand, he was absent to September 15, 1864. He was again in command of the first division, Eighteenth Army Corps, to September 30, 1864, when he was severely wounded in action near Chapin's Bluff, Va., in the right arm, which resulted in its amputation. He was absent from his command on account of this wound to December 12, 1864, upon which date he was ordered to report to the governor of Vermont for assignment to duty. January 17, 1865, he reported to General Dix, and remained under the orders of that officer until March 15, 1866, from which time to the date of his resignation, June 28, 1866, he performed the duties of superintendent of the freedmen's affairs in Maryland, stationed at Baltimore.

The records of the Pension Office contain the following account of the loss of his right arm:

"At the battle of Fort Harrison, on Chapin's farm, Virginia, on the 30th day of September, 1864, while standing on the parapet of said fort and resisting with his troops the assault of the enemy, he was wounded in the right arm above the elbow, by a rifle or musket ball, so injuring the arm that it had to be amputated the same evening at the field hospital of the Eighteenth Army Corps."

General Stannard has received a pension of $30 per month for loss of right arm only, which is all he is entitled to receive under existing laws. He has had no pension on account of any other disability.

Your committee find that he was also wounded in right leg at Gettysburg, July 3, 1863; twice in left leg at Cold Harbor, in June, 1864; in left hand at Petersburg, in July, 1864, causing a stiff finger (the second one): and while on duty in the field in 1864 he contracted the piles, and has been troubled with them ever since. These wounds and the hardships of his army life have caused him severe rheumatic pains for several years last past, occasioning loss of flesh, strength, and sleep, and have disabled him from performing any save the lightest labor.

General Stannard's wound, from a piece of shell, in the right leg, just above the knee, at the battle of Gettysburg, has given him a great deal of pain and suffering. It has broken out, a running sore, three times since that battle, the last being within three years. His two wounds at the battle of Cold Harbor, one in the thigh and one above the ankle, have caused partial paralysis of his left leg. He was also twice wounded in front of Petersburg, once in the left hand, from which a stiff finger resulted. He was also injured, on horseback, in the right testicle, which has developed into a dropsical condition, requiring tapping, which has been done seven or eight times. The general has also suffered from the piles every year more or less. His present pension is allowed solely on account of the loss of his right arm, amputated at the shoulder. Your committee, having made careful inquiry into the other disabilities above mentioned, are satisfied that a proper rating therefor would give him from $18 to $20 per month additional pension, if the law permitted it.

APPENDIX A.

[Report of surgeon's examination of General George J. Stannard, at Burlington, Vt., September 15, 1880.]

The stump is in good condition. There has occurred atrophy of attached muscles; a cicatrix 3 by 2 inches exists upon the right thigh, involving loss of muscular and æreola tissue and constraint in muscular action from cicatrical contraction; rated one-eighth degree; also cicatrix of gunshot wound in middle of left thigh, causing, from loss of tissue and injury to nerve, impairment of strength and constraint in movement; rated one-eighth degree. Wound of hand involves the middle finger, causing enlargement and anchylosis of the second joint; rated one-eighth degree.

There is also chronic inflammation of right testicle, caused by alleged injury from being thrown upon the saddle in riding, while in the United States service. There is enlargement, pain, and tenderness in the organ; rated one-eighth degree. No hemorrhoidal tumors are found. Rheumatic pain in knees and hips is likely due to age and the climate.

We find his disability, as described above, to be equal to and entitling him to $30 for loss of arm, and four-eighths ($15) for other disabilities, in all $45 per month.

H. H. ATWATER,
H. H. LANGDON,
WM. B. LUND,
Board of Examining Surgeons.

He has got to be an old man and is poor. In view of his long, faithful, and gallant service, your committee make a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment increasing his pension to $48 per month.

Mr. MATSON. If the committee will indulge me for a moment, I desire to make a brief statement, that it may go upon the record. General Stannard was an officer of extraordinary ability and extraordinary bravery, having a record that has been very fully described in the report. I suppose he is known to many of the members of this House, being one of the employés on the soldiers' roll. He is a modest, unassuming man, and is as brave as a lion, and well deserves this increase of pension. For twenty years he has only drawn the pension allowed for the loss of his arm, and he has carried seven other wounds, one in his right leg and two in his left leg. We ask that his pension be increased to $48 a month. I apprehend there will be no objection.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, reported that the Committee of the Whole House, pursuant to order, had had under consideration pension bills on the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report sundry bills to the House, some with and some without amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bills reported from the Committee of the Whole without amendment will be first considered.

Mr. MATSON. Before the House proceeds to act upon the bills reported to-night from the Committee of the Whole, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that on the Calendar of unfinished business is a bill which was reported from the Committee of the Whole on Friday last, a bill granting a pension to Amanda Cutler. I said to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOBLITZELL] when that bill was under consideration that I would not ask for a vote on it in the House unless there was a quorum present. Since then he has come to me and stated that he desired to withdraw his objection to the bill, and to have it put on its passage at the first opportunity.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill referred to by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] comes over from Friday last as unfinished business.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill (H. R. 3188) granting a pension to Amanda Çutler, coming over from Friday last as unfinished business, was then taken up for consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment which had been reported from the Committee of the Whole was agreed to, and the question is upon ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was accordingly ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will now proceed to consider the bills reported without amendment from the Committee of the Whole to-night.

The following bills were accordingly taken up and severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 2702) granting a pension to Mrs. Ellida I. Middleton, widow of the late Rear-Admiral Edward Middleton, United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. 79) granting a pension to Caroline M. McDougal, widow of Rear-Admiral David S. McDougal;

A bill (H. R. 4014) for the relief of Isaac Reed;

A bill (H. R. 1752) for the relief of Maria L. Lee;

A bill (H. R. 320) granting a pension to Kate Amann;

A bill (H. R. 1502) granting a pension to William Robinson;

A bill (H. R. 1077) granting a pension to Sarah Miner;

A bill (H. R. 2348) granting a pension to John D. Rickards;

A bill (H. R. 5070) granting a pension to Temple Golden;

A bill (H. R. 5069) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary J. Stotts;

A bill (H. R. 5675) granting a pension to Mrs. Susan J. McKenney;

A bill (H. R. 2670) granting a pension to Sarah A. Scott, widow of John D. Scott, deceased, late first lieutenant of Company H, First Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. 1171) granting a pension to Isabel Campbell;

A bill (H. R. 1197) granting a pension to Anna M. Wehe; and

A bill (H. R. 1203) granting a pension to Elizabeth Bauer.

The bill (H. R. 5464) granting a pension to Clarissa T. Maies was reported from the Committee of the Whole without amendment.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent to make a verbal amendment in this bill. The correct name is Clarissa Y. Maies. I ask that the correction of the name be made both in the body of the bill and in the title.

There was no objection, and the amendment was made accordingly.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The bills reported to-night from the Committee of the Whole with amendments will now be considered.

The following bills reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments were taken up, the amendments concurred in, and the bills as amended severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 406) granting a pension to Catherine Bullard;

A bill (H. R. 4790) granting a pension to Alexander Saint Bernard;

A bill (H. R. 3294) granting a pension to Emma A. Porch; and

A bill (H. R. 2839) to increase the pension of George J. Stannard, late a major-general of volunteers.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the various votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BILLS RECOMMITTED.

Mr. MATSON. I now move that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 3951, for the relief of Margaret Callanan; House bill 2467, granting an increase of pension to Frank M. Woodriff, and House bill 4163, granting a pension to James M. Etter, and that the same be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. YORK. I would ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] for what reason those bills should be recommitted?

Mr. MATSON. In the first case the report of the committee was adverse. Since that report was made the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FIEDLER] has produced evidence which satisfies us that the report ought to be the other way.

Mr. YORK. Why can not the House take proper action?

Mr. MATSON. We prefer to amend our report in that case. In the other two cases the committee desire to make still further investigation. The bills have been somewhat elaborately discussed in Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to; and the bills were accordingly recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 9 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 19, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CLAIMS OF FRENCH CITIZENS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a copy of a report of the Secretary of State, of the 16th instant, in relation to the final award made by the late French and American Claims Commission against the United States for the sum of $625,566.35, for the payment of the claims of French citizens against this Government. I recommend that an appropriation of the above sum be made to enable the Government to fulfill its obligations under the treaty of January 15, 1880, between this country and France.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, April 18, 1884.

VISIT OF SIAMESE EMBASSY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, of the 16th instant, relative to the approaching visit of a special embassy from Siam to the United States, and recommend that the appropriation asked by the Secretary of State to suitably defray the expenses of such embassy while in this country be made.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, April 18, 1884.

INTERNATIONAL STANDARD OF TIME.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, dated the 16th instant, respecting the approaching international conference at Washington, D. C., for the purpose of fixing upon a meridian proper to be employed as a common zero of longitude and standard of time-reckoning throughout the globe, and recommend that the sum of $10,000 be appropriated to enable the Secretary of State to meet the expenses of the same.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, April 18, 1884.

FOREIGN CHARGES UPON AMERICAN VESSELS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reference to the resolution passed by the House of Representatives on the 11th instant in regard to light dues, tonnage charges, &c., imposed on American vessels entering and clearing from the ports of foreign countries; also, with reference to reciprocal treaties between the United States and foreign countries; which was referred to the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests.

Mr. DINGLEY. Should not this communication be printed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the communication does not give the information asked for by the House. The resolution calling for such information should have been directed to the Secretary of State instead of the Secretary of the Treasury.

GRAFTON MONROE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting papers in the claim of Grafton Monroe, postmaster at Grafton, Md., for reimbursement of losses by burglary February 4, 1884; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIM.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a tracing of the plat of survey of the private land claim of Francisco Garcia de Noriega and José Antonio de Noriega, New Mexico, known as the Cañon de San Diego grant; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

YELLOWSTONE PARK.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of March 22, 1884, copies of all leases made by him for the use and occupation of the Yellowstone Park; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BURLEIGH, for one week, from to-day.

To Mr. WARD, until Monday next, on account of important business; and

To Mr. MULLER, until Tuesday next, on account of important business.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 193) to provide for printing certain documents relating to customs revenues and domestic exports for the use of Congress.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr WASHBURN. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 4799) to authorize the construction of foot and carriage or railroad bridges across the Mississippi River at Saint Paul, Minn.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which there will be opportunity for objection.

Mr. BEACH. Before time has been occupied in the reading, I object to the present consideration of the bill.

CHARLES M. BLAKE.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 77) for the relief of Charles M. Blake, a chaplain of the United States Army.

Mr. CALKINS. Inasmuch as objection has been made to a request on this side for unanimous consent, I call for the regular order.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] to withdraw that call for a moment, in order that the Post-Office appropriation bill, which has been returned from the Senate with amendments, may be taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and, with the amendments, ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALKINS. I withdraw the call for that purpose.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, was taken from the Speaker's table, and, with the amendments of the Senate, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. HANCOCK. I move that the morning hour be dispensed with; and I will state my purpose is to have the House take up the pension appropriation bill, which I think can be disposed of in an hour.

The SPEAKER. There is no morning hour to-day. Under the resolution adopted some days since, and which the Chair will direct the Clerk to read, this day has been set apart for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Labor.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, April 19, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Labor, to wit: A bill to establish and maintain a department of labor statistics; a bill to prohibit the importation of laborers under contracts made abroad; a bill to enforce the eight-hour law and to provide for the payment of wages withheld from employés of the Government in violation of the eight-hour law; and a bill to prohibit the system of contract labor by convicts in so far as Federal prisoners are concerned.

Mr. HANCOCK. Does not that exclude the consideration of the appropriation bills to-day?

The SPEAKER. It does, if the Committee on Labor insists on going on with the business of that committee. If not, the House can proceed to transact its ordinary business.

Mr. HOPKINS. I shall insist that the House proceed to the consideration of the special order.

Mr. MILLS. My colleague can raise the question of consideration.

REPORTS OF UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

Mr. SCALES, from the Committee on Printing, reported back the joint resolution (H. Res. 138) for printing the annual reports of the United States Geological Survey.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That there be printed at the Government Printing Office, in addition to the number already ordered by law, 15,000 copies of each of the annual reports of the Director of the United States Geological Survey, beginning with the fourth and uniform with the preceding volumes of the series; of which 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 8,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 for distribution by the Geological Survey.

Mr. SCALES. I ask that the report accompanying the joint resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred H. Res. 138, authorizing the printing of 15,000 additional copies of the annual reports of the Bureau of Geology for 1883, submit the following report, recommending the passage of the resolution:

In the act of Congress approved March 3, 1879, creating the Geological Survey, it is provided that there shall be printed of the special memoirs and reports of said survey 3,000 copies, "for scientific exchange and for sale at the price of publication." The same act provides that the "annual report of operations of the Geological Survey shall accompany the annual report of the Secretary of the Interior." From this it will be seen that only the annual reports, which form a part of the reports of the Secretary of the Interior and are printed as executive documents, are available for gratuitous distribution. Of this volume there is printed the usual number, 1,900, and also 3,000 copies for distribution by Congress. There are usually ordered by the Secretary of the Interior 750 copies of his annual report for distribution by himself, a very limited number, no portion of which can be spared for the use of the Geological Survey or Congress.

The survey has entered upon a system of exchange with every prominent library, every scientific and learned institution in America, and with many hundreds in other parts of the world. To these institutions it will be impossible, under present circumstances, to send copies of its annual report, nor is it possible, under existing circumstances, for it to issue copies to individual collaborators interested in the work conducted under its auspices. The report is made up largely of extracts from the monographs of the survey, which are distributed only by sale or exchange. The volume is prepared for the popular reader, and is intended to convey the earliest information in the possession of the survey concerning the various branches of economic geology.

Of the second and third annual reports there have been issued 11,000 copies in addition to the number above given, and this number has proved utterly inadequate to supply the demand, which has come not only from our own country but from all parts of the world.

The major expense connected with the publication of these reports consists in the preparation of the illustrations and the composition of the text, and the cost of the edition of 15,000 copies is not all in proportion to the original outlay attendant upon the publication of the 49,000 copies now provided for by law. The estimated cost is $18,843.15.

Mr. SCALES. It is unnecessary to add anything to what is contained in the report, as it is full and furnishes the House with all the information necessary to vote intelligently on the joint resolution. I therefore ask for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCALES moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ANNUAL REPORTS OF THE BUREAU OF ETHNOLOGY.

Mr. SCALES, from the Committee on Printing, also reported back the joint resolution (H. Res. 137) for printing the annual reports of the Bureau of Ethnology.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 15,000 copies of each of the annual reports of the Director of the Bureau of Ethnology, with accompanying papers and illustrations, beginning with the report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and uniform with the preceding volumes of the series; of which 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 8,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 for distribution by the Bureau of Ethnology.

Mr. SCALES. I ask that the report accompanying the joint resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred H. Res. 137, authorizing the printing of 15,000 copies of the annual report, 1833, of the Bureau of Ethnology, submit the following report, recommending the passage of the resolution:

The Bureau of Ethnology was provided for by an appropriation from Congress in the fiscal year of 1879, and has been continued by successive appropriations from year to year for the purpose of making archæologic and ethnologic researches among the North American Indians. Extensive areas in the South, West, and Southwest have been explored, large and valuable collections have been secured. The mounds of many Western and Southern States explored and examined, resulting in important discoveries and valuable collections, which at some future time will be made up into sets for distribution to colleges throughout the country. The collections made by the bureau were fast disappearing by curiosity-seekers and foreign collectors, and it became a matter of importance to secure them as fully as possible. A very great amount of important historical data have resulted from these explorations and examinations, which can only reach the public at large through published reports.

As Congress has expended considerable money in prosecuting these researches, the information should be published as proposed by this resolution, in order to provide our institutions of learning as well as the people of this and other countries with the results thus obtained.

The Bureau of Ethnology issues no publications except those ordered by Congress. The first, second, and third annual reports of the bureau have already been ordered by Congress, and each edition was the same in number, 15,000, as called for in this resolution.

These reports are prepared in popular form, and are designed for general distribution, and to colleges, schools, teachers and collaborators in this branch of research in this and other countries. They are also to be distributed to institutions of learning, libraries, and scientific men in all foreign countries, in exchange for which our Government receives a large number of similar publications from each of those countries, all of which become the property of the United States and are deposited in the Library of Congress.

A large proportion of these exchanges could not in any other manner be obtained, as most foreign institutions will not sell their publications, but are willing to make exchanges.

A great saving, in the future, will be made in the illustrations, which hereafter will be made so as to allow the printing to proceed with the letter-press of the report, which heretofore, in a great measure, have been colored lithographs printed by hand. The estimated cost of 15,000 copies is $24,138.

Mr. SCALES demanded the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCMILLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VENEZUELAN CLAIMS.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back the following resolution with the recommendation that it be adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to furnish this House with a copy of the list of certificates issued by the late Venezuelan Mixed Commission, together with copies of all assignments or transfers of such certificates, notified to the Department of State, and a statement showing to whom the several payments by the Department upon such certificates have been made; and also copies of all correspondence relating to requests for payments thereupon or in respect to the hearing of all claimants before a new commission; and as by the joint resolution approved by the President on the 3d day of March, 1883, the moneys paid by the Venezuelan Government and remaining in the hands of the Secretary of State and to be applied on such awards as may be made by the new commission provided for by said joint resolution, the Secretary of State is requested to furnish this House with a statement of the amount now on hand applicable to the payment of such new awards.

The report of the committtee was read, as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the resolution of inquiry submitted by Mr. SPRINGER relative to Venezuelan claims, after considering the same beg leave to report, that in the opinion of the committee the information called for is of such importance as to warrant the passage of the resolution hereby recommended.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Printing, reported joint resolution (H. Res. 231) providing for the distribution of the Congressional Globe; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Public Printer is hereby authorized and directed to deliver to the document-rooms of the Department of the Interior the bound volumes of the Congressional Globe purchased from Messrs. Rives, and such other bound volumes of the Globe and RECORD, prior to the Forty-eighth Congress, as are in his charge; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed, from said volumes, to supply, as far as possible, existing deficiencies in the sets of these documents in the following libraries, in the order named:

First. The library of the Executive Mansion, the library of each of the Executive Departments of the Government, the library of the Supreme Court, and the library of the Court of Claims.

Secondly. The State and Territorial libraries of the United States.

Thirdly. Such other libraries in the United States as contain more than 5,000 volumes each. And the Public Printer is hereby directed, on the requisition of the Secretary of the Interior, to deliver to him such volumes of the Globe now in his charge in unbound form as may be desired by any of the above libraries for the completion of the set of the same, which shall be forwarded to said library upon receiving its assurance that it will cause the volumes thus supplied to be bound and placed upon its shelves: Provided, That before such distribution is made the Public Printer shall deliver to the libraries of House and Senate such volumes as are required to complete fifty sets in each.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior shall report to Congress the libraries to which these documents are forwarded, and the number of volumes delivered to each.

Mr. SMITH asked for the reading of the report accompanying the joint resolution.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing report to the House joint resolution No. 103, amended in such way as to relieve the Government of all expense in the matter of distributing the Congressional Globe, and also providing that before such distribution is made the libraries of the Senate and House of Representatives shall be supplied with such number of copies as will be probably required for many years to come, and recommend its adoption.

The Congressional Globes, whose distribution is here provided for, were purchased in 1878, and have since been stored, awaiting the action of Congress as to the disposition to be made of them. They aggregate about 60,000 volumes, of which about 40,000 are unbound and 20,000 bound, consisting almost entirely of odd volumes of this document. Of this collection, the Public Printer, in his annual report for 1878, after stating the expense of reprinting a sufficient number of the missing volumes to make 500 complete sets, says: "It will be perceived that, unless a reprint is had, the volumes on hand are almost valueless, except for waste paper." And in his report for 1880, again recurring to the subject, he remarks: "It is respectfully submitted for the consideration of Congress, that should it be determined not to direct a sufficient number of volumes to be printed to make a specified number of sets, then to authorize the sale of the odd volumes, bound and unbound, at public auction, to the highest bidder, as waste paper."

In the judgment of the committee, however, this will be a most unwise disposition to make of these volumes. They form a most valuable collection from which to supply deficiencies in the public libraries of the country, and if Congress does not deem it expedient to incur the large expense involved in reprinting the missing volumes, the odd numbers on hand should be used for this purpose. An opportunity is now afforded for adding to, if not completing, a large number of sets of the Globe in the large libraries of the land, which will probably never again occur, and the committee know of no disposition that can be made of these odd volumes more judicious, involving as it does no expense and avoiding the multiplication of broken sets.

Replies to inquiries addressed to all the principal libraries of the country disclose the following facts: That of twenty-six State and Territorial libraries reporting, only four contain complete sets of the Globe; of three hundred and forty other libraries, containing each 5,000 volumes or more, only two possess complete sets. There are probably a few other complete sets in libraries from which no returns have been received.

Most of the libraries, however, contain partial sets, many with but a few missing volumes, any addition to which will be highly prized. To add to already existing collections for the purpose of making them more complete rather than to increase the number of partial sets is by far the wisest policy to pursue in the disposition of these documents.

A. HERR SMITH.

Mr. SMITH demanded the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMITH moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOPKINS. I now demand the regular order.

Before moving that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the special business assigned for to-day—the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on Labor—I desire to express the appreciation of that committee to the House for the courtesy extended to us in granting this day for the consideration of our bills and the execution of our business; and I want to invoke the co-operation of the members of the House in the dispatch of that business, hoping to accomplish as much as possible during the short time the committee have asked. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that general debate upon the first bill which the committee shall call up, the bill (H. R. 1340) to establish and maintain a bureau of labor statistics, be limited to three hours, assuring gentlemen that members of the committee will not require one-third of that time.

Several MEMBERS. Say two hours.

Mr. HOPKINS. At the suggestion of members all around me I will make the request to limit the general debate to two hours in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the request for unanimous consent to the House. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union all general debate upon the bill indicated shall be limited to two hours?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS.

Mr. HOPKINS. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill to establish a bureau a labor statistics.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. WELLBORN in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of a bill the title of which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1340) to establish and maintain a bureau of labor statistics.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be established and maintained at the seat of Government a department of labor statistics, which shall be under the charge of a commissioner of labor statistics, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The commissioner of labor statistics shall hold his office for four years, unless sooner removed, and shall receive a salary of $4,000 a year. The commissioner shall acquire all useful information upon the subject of labor, its relations to capital, and the means of promoting the material, social, intellectual, and religious prosperity of laboring men and women; and to this end he shall inquire into the various industries of the United States; the capital invested therein; the division of labor and its results; machinery and its effects; the number of persons employed as laborers, with a classification thereof, male and female, married and unmarried, skilled or unskilled, convict labor, Chinese labor; the number and ages of children, nature of their occupation, their attendance at school and church; the wages paid by the day, week, or month, or by the piece, to the different classes; the hours employed; the average earnings of the several classes; the manner of paying wages; the truck or store-order system, and the profits charged on goods by employers; the cost of living, comparing wages and price of necessaries of life in different localities; the sanitary, educational, social, and religious condition of laborers; the average duration of life; accidents incident to employment; insanity; epidemics; factory, mill, mine, and dwelling inspections; schools and churches, facilities for attending, and extent to which they are enjoyed; statistics of crime, &c.; co-operation, its extent and results in various localities and branches of trade; the division of their joint production between labor and capital, where practiced, the pro rata of each, and the general effect; trades-unions and labor associations, the number, membership, and objects; strikes, their causes, effects, and remedies. And to enable the commissioner to obtain the information herein specified he shall have authority to issue circulars to various manufacturers and labor associations, with interrogatories to be answered. The commissioner of labor statistics shall obtain all possible information upon the various subjects above specified from the different foreign nations, and shall have authority to issue circulars to United States consuls asking them to obtain the information desired. The commissioner of labor statistics shall appoint a chief clerk, who shall receive a salary of $2,000 per annum, and such other employés as Congress may from time to time provide. During the necessary absence of the commissioner, or when the office shall become vacant, the chief clerk shall perform the duties of commissioner. The commissioner shall annually make a report in writing to the President and Congress of the information collected and collated by him, and containing such recommendations as he may deem calculated to promote the efficiency of the department.

Mr. HOPKINS. It will be observed that this bill confers no executive powers upon the department which it is intended to create. It simply provides for the accumulation of information as an auxiliary to judicious legislation. It may be said, and truly said, that much of this information is acquired by the Census Bureau. But it should be remembered that the census reports are only made at intervals of ten years; and that it is important that the changing conditions of each year should be brought to the attention of those called upon to legislate on the basis of existing facts.

Under the provisions of this bill Congress will each year be advised of the condition of the various industries, the relation of capital to labor, the wages paid, the cost of living, and the innumerable matters affecting the material prosperity, sanitary, social, moral, and educational status of the laboring people. And this proposed department has a wider scope and is capable of more enlarged usefulness than a census report limited to inquiries into the situation of affairs in this country alone. It is herein provided that information shall be acquired from the different foreign nations, to the end that correct comparisons may be instituted; and in this way it is hoped there may be attained some settled basis of thought, and we may cease to be embarrassed by that divergence of opinion which promotes endless and perhaps much fruitless discussion.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the pending bill is so manifestly just and proper that no argument should be needed to insure its passage. I only repeat what is in the mind and upon the tongue of almost every one when I say that the labor problem is one of the most important questions demanding and commanding the attention of the people. It is important not only because of the vast numbers—the many millions of our citizens directly engaged in productive industries—but also because of its direct and inseparable connection with many of the subjects of legislation.

In 1789, within a few days after the organization of the First Congress, the discussion of the tariff question began, and it has continued with unabated zeal to the present hour. In fact, as the country has grown and the interests involved have increased, the scope of the discussion has widened, and the attention to the issues involved has become more and more absorbing. And in all of these debates even the ablest and best informed, upon either side, have felt the want of authentic data in reference to matters materially affecting the question.

Some spasmodic and feeble efforts have been made to supply this want. The Forty-sixth Congress appointed a committee to inquire into and report upon the subject of wages at home and abroad. And the American consuls have at times transmitted such information upon this subject as was conveniently accessible.

In March, 1882, a tariff commission was created to thoroughly investigate the various industrial interests of this country. This commission visited different sections of the country, and published two large volumes of testimony. But they made no thorough investigation. They merely received statements voluntarily offered. It was but a temporary expedient. The commission was composed of men having large interests to distract their minds. Its sessions were necessarily hurried, and its results, while valuable, were far from satisfactory. In the following session of Congress elaborate arguments were made by eminent gentlemen, and carefully prepared tables were presented setting forth the information which each disputant was able to collect as to the rates of wages and cost of living of laborers employed in various manufactories. A comparison of those tables and of those in the report of the Tariff Commission will show how contradictory, unreliable, and unsatisfactory all such partial and unofficial statements are. It is a truism that arguments predicated upon disputed facts can not carry conviction because of the uncertainty of the premises. And in the absence of recognized authority upon mooted questions there can be no limit to contention, no means of reaching accurate and settled conclusions. Theories will continue to be advocated and controverted until some well-established touchstone can be applied which will crystallize them into facts or dispel them as dreams.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is not in the interest of any particular school of political economists. It will furnish information for all, and just such information as all political scientists desire and demand. Mr. Nimmo, the very able and efficient Chief of the Bureau of Statistics in the Treasury Department, says:

Judging from personal experience, I should say that the number of inquiries propounded in regard to these matters by the advocates of protection and by the advocates of free trade is about equal.

And just here it is well to correct a misapprehension which exists in regard to the powers and duties of the present Bureau of Statistics. This Bureau is required to investigate commercial and transportation interests, and to prepare statistics upon imports and the duties thereon. It does nothing whatever with the manufacturing and industrial interests. Resolutions are often passed by each branch of Congress calling for information upon these subjects, and there is no department or officer charged with the collection and compilation of such data.

On December 21, 1881, the Senate passed a resolution calling for information as to the rates of wages paid to laborers in the United States, Great Britain, France, and Germany in the manufactures of cotton, wool, iron, leather, &c. The fact and the result of that inquiry show the supreme necessity for the passage of some such bill as the one under consideration.

I quote from Mr. Nimmo:

Diligent search was made for available data in the various offices of the Government, and letters were addressed to every man in the country of whom I had any knowledge and who I thought was best qualified in the line of his specialty to furnish the exact data required. But I never engaged in a more fruitless search. Gentlemen generally regarded as authorities on subjects relating to the several industries mentioned in the resolution frankly declared that they were unable to furnish the exact information called for, namely, relative wages based upon contemporaneous data, and taking into account differences in the hours of labor and in the organization of labor, and as to whether wages were paid by the day or by the piece, and also making due allowance for arrangements in regard to the boarding of operatives and the providing of tenement houses for the families of operatives, and for the regularity of employment, and the extent to which in the several countries production depends upon human skill or upon the use of machinery. A perfunctory reply to the Senate resolution, omitting the proper consideration of all these differences in the conditions under which labor is employed, would have been worthless. A statement based upon available data as to wages paid could have been prepared; but such a table, in the absence of any knowledge of the various conditions under which labor is employed, would have been of no practical value.

During the present session of Congress the same difficulty has arisen; and I feel sure every member of the Committee on Ways and Means, each of the one hundred and ten gentlemen who are on the Speaker's list for debate, and every one who would form an intelligent judgment upon this important question, must feel the necessity of having a department of government where the required information can be had. Many, perhaps all, European governments have departments similar to the one contemplated by this bill, and in no country is there greater necessity for the acquisition of all knowledge affecting the prosperity of the whole people than in this, which has been well said to be "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people."

It is alike the duty and the interest of the Government to see that a healthful, vigorous, educated, and prosperous race of citizens is reared. And under the provisions of this bill whatever wrongs there may be will be made manifest, and the proper remedies can be provided. Congress can exercise the functions which belong to the Federal Government; and the several States can act within their appropriate spheres upon the information acquired with reference to their own citizens, and upon the knowledge derived through this compilation of the experience and action of other Commonwealths.

Many of the States of the Union have already established bureaus of statistics, which, although but partially equipped, serve to illustrate the incalculable advantage of a systematic and thorough collection and a convenient and authentic compilation of the data which this bill contemplates, not alone throughout this country, but from others with which we hold commercial intercourse, and it may be commercial rivalry. And this bureau will supplement the acquisitions of those already formed and supply a want felt by all.

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose in this connection to discuss any phase of the tariff controversy. This bill is not intended to advance any theory, but simply to supply the facts upon which wise and considerate statesmanship can exercise itself. The departments sought to be established, as I have already said, is one for information only. No executive powers are conferred by the bill. And who can object to the acquisition and diffusion of any knowledge that is useful? The eagerness with which the Census Reports are sought only illustrates the popular demand for the interesting and varied information which they contain.

Congress has from time to time responded to the general desire for scientific and statistical knowledge, and has furnished abundant precedents for the action I now advocate. Even before the adoption of our Constitution the Secretary of State was directed by Congress "to obtain from the ministers and agents of the United States in foreign countries an abstract of their present state, their commerce, finance, * * * and every other political information which may be useful to the United States." The early explorations of Lewis and Clarke to the Pacific Ocean; Long's explorations between the Red River, the northern boundary, and the Rocky Mountains; the expeditions and investigations of Owen, Frémont, Abert, Stansbury, Hayden, Powell, Wheeler, and King were all made under the auspices and at the expense of the Government.

Several expeditions have been sent to the Arctic Ocean, and Captain Wilkes was sent to the Antarctic; Lieutenant Herndon to the Amazon, Commodore Perry to Japan; a number of Army officers were detailed to watch the Crimean war; astronomical parties have been sent to remote regions to observe the transit of Venus—all for the accumulation and dissemination of knowledge. Why do we maintain the Botanical Garden, the National Museum, the Naval Observatory, the Medical Library and Museum, the Library of Congress? Why have we published the Medical and Surgical History of the War? Why have we purchased works of art to adorn the Capitol? All of these things were to instruct, enlighten, and improve the people.

The Government can perform no more useful work than in adding to the aggregate of human knowledge. And certainly a knowledge of our fellow-men and fellow-citizens is not the least important of information.

Mr. Chairman, it is well to remember that a nation's wealth, and strength, and glory, do not consist alone in its extended area and replete treasury.

"What constitutes a state?
Not high-raised battlement or labored mound,
Thick wall or moated gate;
Not cities proud with spires and turrrets crowned;
Not bays and broad-armed ports,
Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride;
Not starred and spangled courts,
Where low-browed baseness wafts perfume to pride.
No; men, high-minded men,
With power as far above dull brutes endowed.
* * * * * *
Men who their duties know,
But know their rights, and knowing dare maintain.
* * * * * *
These constitute a state."

The Government has already established a Bureau of Mines and Mining, a Bureau of Statistics of Commerce, a Bureau of Education, a Geological Survey, a Fish Commission, a Signal Service, and a Department of Agriculture, all of which have served a useful purpose. But no one of them, nor all combined, exceed in importance the department I now advocate. We have appropriated large sums of money to learn something about the insects which are injurious to agriculture; to investigate the diseases of animals, and to ascertain the quality and strength of wools and of cotton and the textile strength of iron and steel; and, while conceding that all such information is desirable, I contend that it is at least equally necessary to be informed of the sanitary, moral, educational, and social condition of the men who toil in the fields, the mines, and the mills, and upon whose physical and mental welfare and material prosperity the Government must largely depend for its supporters in peace and its defenders in war.

A great deal of public attention in and out of Congress has been given to the American hog and the American steer. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is time to give more attention to the American man.

Capital always receives ample consideration here, and corporations have had far more than their share of favors, but legislation in the interest of the working people has been rare and stinted. This House has shown a disposition to atone for this neglect by creating a committee on labor to consider all matters pertaining thereto. This recognition has been gratefully appreciated, and the eyes of the toilers all over the land are now turned toward Congress with an earnest hope and expectation that their welfare will be thoughtfully considered. They regard this bill as of great advantage to their interest, because under it their condition can be fully and truthfully ascertained; the relation which wages bear to capital can be demonstrated, a comparison can be instituted between the cost of living and compensation received in the various industries at home and abroad, the duty and the policy of the Government can be made apparent, and the wrangles of schoolmen will be in a measure silenced.

It is not claimed that this bill will be a panacea for all the ills that afflict the laboring classes; but it will enable Congress to obtain that knowledge of their situation which is essential to any just legislation upon matters affecting their interests.

Mr. Chairman, I speak in behalf of over ten millions of toilers in this country, who are anxiously watching our proceedings, when I ask the passage of this bill; but at the same time I speak in the interest of more than fifty millions of citizens, for all are interested in promoting the welfare, increasing the prosperity, happiness, and contentment of all our people, and in thus perfecting the stability, the beauty, and symmetry of the Republic. A community of interest and sympathy, of kindly feeling and considerate action, removes all cause of complaint and dissension, solidifies the patriotic sentiment, erects barriers impenetrable to foreign foes, and destroys the possibility of internal strife.

I trust the House will show that it is in harmony with the people by the prompt passage of this bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him why the most of this work, the great part of it, can not be done by the present bureau?

Mr. HOPKINS. The present Bureau of Statistics?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes; why its work can not be added to the work now done by that bureau?

Mr. HOPKINS. I presume it might be accomplished to some extent in that way; but I understand that the present Bureau of Statistics is now overcrowded with work, having more than it can conveniently accomplish.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then all that they need is more employés.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have stated one objection to imposing the work upon the present bureau; that is, that it now has more than it can conveniently accomplish. My judgment is that the work which we here seek to provide for will be far better accomplished by having a separate and independent bureau for that purpose, a bureau that will have its attention specifically directed in this direction and not be liable to be diverted from time to time by inquiries in regard to commerce, navigation, imports, and duties thereon.

Mr. BLOUNT. One other inquiry. I notice that this bill declares that the annual expenditures of this bureau shall not exceed $25,000. I would like to know if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] does not think it is impossible at this time to say how much will be expended by this bureau in the work which it will be called upon to perform?

Mr. HOPKINS. The bill provides that the expenditures shall not exceed that amount.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes. The bill provides for starting this bureau and declares that the expenditures shall not exceed $25,000 a year.

Mr. HOPKINS. I presume that matter will have ultimately to be regulated by the Committee on Appropriations. I do not suppose that during the first year after the organization of the department the expenditures would exceed that amount. Subsequently it is probable, and I think it is due to frankness that I should say, that the expenditures will largely exceed that amount.

Mr. BLOUNT. Very likely this bureau will grow and increase as all the others have done.

Mr. HOPKINS. I presume so.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Allow me to make a suggestion.

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Is it not likely that a large portion of the information for which this bureau is designed will be furnished voluntarily, so that you can reasonably expect that the expense will be comparatively small?

Mr. HOPKINS. Unquestionably the labor associations of the country that are anxious for the passage of this bill will voluntarily do all in their power to secure the efficiency of the department to be created by it.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard upon this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to oppose the bill?

Mr. YOUNG. I have already made a speech in favor of the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] desires to speak now I will give way to him.

Mr. HOPKINS. I had an hour; I do not know how much time I have consumed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has forty minutes of his hour still remaining.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then I will yield a portion of that time to any gentleman who desires it.

Mr. AIKEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if this bureau is limited to the collection of mechanical statistics or agricultural statistics, or does it include both?

Mr. HOPKINS. It is for the collection of statistics pertaining to manual labor of all kinds.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate upon this bill has been limited to two hours. Is the Chair to understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] is now controling one-half of that time in favor of the bill? It may be that some gentleman may want to speak in opposition to the bill; if so, the Chair would recognize some one to control the time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have heard no intimation of opposition to the bill from any source whatever. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] proposes to offer an amendment to the bill, and desires to speak upon that.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. That can be done after general debate is closed.

Mr. YOUNG. If no one else desires it, I will claim the benefit of the other hour.

Mr. HOPKINS. I stated to the House before going into Committee of the Whole that the members of the Committee on Labor did not desire to occupy more than one hour of the two hours assigned for general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, in a government like ours, where the existence of popular suffrage renders the working classes the chief repository of political power, all reliable information relating to the financial, educational, and sanitary condition of labor possesses a deep interest, which becomes more general as the industries of the country increase in diversity and extent and the agitation continues in regard to this relation between capital and labor.

LABOR ORGANIZATIONS.

The labor organizations of the United States, which have brought within the folds of organization every department of productive industry until to-day they number over half a million of members, demand from Congress the establishment of a bureau of labor statistics, in order that knowledge may be the standpoint for action and to secure for the toilers all those rights and privileges necessary to enjoy and appreciate the blessings of good government.

STATE BUREAUS.

During the past twenty years this demand has been continuously made upon the legislators by the labor organizations of this country, until the justice of their demand has been conceded, and already eleven of the principal States of the Union have created bureaus of labor statistics. The great Commonwealth of Massachusetts, with its vast manufacturing interests and great laboring population, was the first to recognize the necessity of a bureau of this character. In 1866 a commission was appointed to examine the subject of labor, on which commission were F. B. Sanborn and Elizur Wright, who recommended the establishment of such a bureau. In 1867 a similar commission, on which was the eminent economist Amasa Walker, made the same recommendation. In 1869 the bureau was finally established, and its fourteen annual reports since that year, if they embraced the whole country, would be invaluable. Pennsylvania, recognizing the value of such statistics, followed with a law in 1872; Ohio in 1877; New Jersey in 1878; Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri in 1879; and New York, California, Michigan, and Wisconsin in 1883. The pending bill is substantially the same measure which I introduced in this House at the commencement of this session, and is identical with the laws creating the various bureaus in the different States.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The following criticisms from the press give evidence of the worth of these bureaus:

Springfield Republican, April 26, 1872:

Each successive year increases, perhaps we may say doubles, the value of the annual reports sent out from the Massachusetts bureau of labor statistics.

American Artisan, May 29, 1872:

The institution and maintenance by the State of such a bureau can not be too highly commended.

The Boston Commonwealth in 1872:

So the effort now is to abolish the bureau of labor. The struggle between capital and labor is growing bitter—bitter now even on the side of capital. It objects to investigation of its methods.

New York Weekly Tribune, March 11, 1874:

More light is thrown upon this subject (labor) by the facts gathered in such reports as that of the Massachusetts labor bureau, which we present elsewhere, than all the fine-spun theories of doctrinaires or the cant of labor demagogues would furnish in a century.

New York Graphic, March 13, 1874:

We must prepare for a better state of things in the next generation by laying the foundations in this. If true civilization thinks more of characters than commodities and will not consent to use up human beings for the sake of cheapening cloth a cent on the yard, "the test of civilization is the estimate in which it holds human beings."

Brooklyn Daily Argus, March 17, 1875:

The latest report of the Massachusetts bureau of statistics of labor, which has been made with painstaking care, furnishes a multitude of facts and suggestions which are of application here and which will interest a Brooklyn audience.

Chicago Tribune, March 19, 1875, speaking of the Massachusetts bureau, says:

There is no other organization in the country which does a like work. * * * The reports contain a mass of information which is obtainable nowhere else. It is to be hoped the good work will go on.

With how much more force would the foregoing criticisms apply to a national bureau.

HEADS OF DEPARTMENTS SEEKING INFORMATION.

The various Departments of the Government have recognized the demand for information affecting the working classes. The Secretary of the Treasury (Bristow) transmitted to Congress, December 18, 1875, a special report of Mr. Edward Young, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, on the rates of wages, the cost of subsistence, and the condition of the working classes in Great Britain, Germany, France, Belgium, and other countries of Europe, also in the United States and British America.

The Secretary of State, April 11, 1878, issued the following labor circular:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 11, 1878.

To the consular officers of the United States in Great Britain, France, Germany, Belgium, Italy, Spain, the Netherlands, Sweden and Norway, and Denmark.

GENTLEMEN: With reference to the circular addressed to you in August, 1877, in respect of the trade of the United States with foreign countries, it is now deemed desirable that you should make inquiries and report in regard to the following points, namely:

First. The rate of wages usually paid to laborers of every class, but with more especial reference to agricultural laborers, mechanical laborers, and those upon public works and railways.

Second. The cost of living to the laboring class, or the prices paid for what may be termed the necessaries of life.

Third. So far as practicable, a comparison of the present rates with those prevailing during the past five years, both as to wages and cost of living.

Fourth. Such information as may be obtainable touching the present state of trade, whether prosperous or otherwise; the amount and character of paper money, if any, as circulation; and the amount and character of coin, with the relation borne by paper and coin to each other.

Fifth. And lastly, such information as may be obtainable as to the business habits and systems of your districts.

It is desired that the information which may come to your knowledge on the foregoing points should be embraced in a report to the Department, to be made as soon as may be practicable.

I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

F. W. SEWARD, Acting Secretary.

May 17, 1879, the Secretary of State, Hon. William M. Evarts, submitted said reports, together with an elaborate letter, from which I make the following extracts:

These reports, covering as they do the labor question in all its aspects, * * * embrace so vast and interesting a field of investigation, * * * presenting a compact yet comprehensive view of the present state of labor in the various countries of Europe and at the same time a comparison between labor in those countries and the United States. Let the workingmen read these reports and compare the fixed condition of the European labor populations as graphically portrayed by our consuls with the free and independent position of our American workingmen, not as special depression has made them at present, but as they have been and as they will be again.

Let the workingman feel, as he should feel, that the man who employs him, who enables him to feed and clothe his wife and children, is his friend as well as his employer, and that all within and about the workshops are things to be protected, even with life if necessary, instead of being destroyed. Let the employer, on the other hand, as in Belgium and in Germany, look upon his workman as morally one of his family, to be treated with the dignity and sympathy which are his due, and in ten years we shall be known and felt in all the markets of the world, for under such circumstances neither cheap foreign labor nor the vast capital at its back could compete with the inventive genius, mechanical skill, and financial audacity of the workingmen and capitalists of the United States.

LABOR IN EUROPE.

The information contained in Young's report in 1875 and the consular reports in 1879 is remarkably complete in giving detailed information of the mode of living, wages, social conditions, and everything pertaining to the condition of labor in Europe; also as to the laws of many of those countries relative to the protection of labor. Comparisons are made through all these reports between wages and the cost of living in Europe and the United States. I was amazed in reading the appendix to Secretary Evarts's report to find that his information in regard to wages and food prices in the United States, which he used for comparison with the wages and cost of living in Europe, were furnished by two individuals, one residing in Chicago and the other the editor of the American Exporter, of New York.

The reports made by consuls fairly teem with pictures of the degradation, misery, and poverty existing in various parts of Europe—the extreme low wages paid there and the high cost of living, as compared with the United States, while they are necessarily silent on the condition of labor in this country, nothing being furnished except the wages and food prices at New York and Chicago. The foregoing reports comprise the only official information furnished by the Government, except the census reports of 1880, now being slowly issued, and which will hardly be completed before the time arrives for taking the next census.

ALL CLASSES DESIRE INFORMATION.

In 1875 Mr. Young, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, in his report refers to the demand for information relating to the working classes as follows:

In consequence of the agitation in regard to the relations between capital and labor, which has signally marked the last decade, and since the organization of this bureau, the applications for information on this subject have steadily increased in number.

Such applications are received from various classes of persons—from political economists and students of social science, from journalists engaged in the discussion of economic and social questions, from philanthropists desirous of improving the condition of the working classes, from representatives of labor associations, from persons representing the interests of employers, and, finally, from prominent members of both Houses of Congress, desirous of applying to the task of practical legislation such data on the subject of labor at home and abroad as have been acquired by observation and experience. These applications have been especially numerous in connection with legislation on the subject of the tariff, and a review of the debates on tariff legislation for many years past will show with what avidity both protectionists and free-traders have availed themselves of any information within their reach upon the subject under consideration, and especially on the cost of labor and the condition of the laborer in those countries of Europe which compete most sharply with American manufactures.

This was written in 1875, and the members of this House will appreciate how extremely applicable it is to-day.

POVERTY AND SUFFERING IN EUROPE.

You all remember when the discussion on the pending tariff bill commenced that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, Judge KELLEY, made some startling revelations of what he witnessed during his visit to Europe, of the suffering and degradation among the working classes there, and described with great pathos the wasting away of human beings there from lack of proper food. I do not doubt it. Every report published confirms such statements; but did the gentleman ever take the trouble to look at the condition of affairs at home?

POVERTY AND SUFFERING IN THE UNITED STATES.

The testimony taken last year by the Senate Committee on Education and Labor does not exhibit the condition of our working classes in as roseate a light as we would wish.

The president of the Cigar-Makers' Union gives a frightful picture of the squalor, misery, and degradation among the cigar-makers, and of the employment of infants at work, which stunted their growth and ruined their health. John Swinton testified that during the year 1874 over 100,000 people in the city of New York lived by pauperism and beggary; that, including children, the deaths in New York from lack of proper food exceeded 10,000 annually.

The testimony of R. L. Layton concerning the condition of the coal-miners shows as much suffering and degradation as exists in the poorest coal region of Europe.

The testimony of every workman examined bristles with complaints against the unjust exactions of capital and the ignoring of the rights of labor.

The Committee on Labor of this House will, when the time arrives for the discussion of the bill to prohibit the importation of labor under contract, give this House a frightful picture of the poverty and suffering among the coal-miners that will put our boasted progress and civilization to the blush.

The following extract from a recent issue of the Cincinnati Enquirer is presented. That journal says:

We doubt if anywhere on earth, except in the coal-mines of England, a more wretched, poverty-stricken, unhappy, and miserable lot of women can be found than the shirt-makers of New York. There are thousands of these women, and they work all day long and part of every night for a miserable pittance. The work is excessively hard. They make the garments for the big dealers, and so great is the competition that a day's labor, extending from 7 o'clock in the morning till 10 at night, results in the munificent stipend of 45 cents a day. They live in garrets and cellars, and they are, without exception, wan, sickly-looking, and weary.

Pages could be filled with like testimony, but the brief time allowed for the discussion of this measure will not permit of its being read.

ADVANTAGES OF A NATIONAL LABOR BUREAU.

We are asked what are the advantages and benefits to be derived from the institution of a labor bureau. Some of them are that while the State bureaus are doing valuable work, it is apparent that these can not accomplish what is needed; not only will State interests interfere and lack of united action present an insurmountable obstacle, but the differences in methods, the variety of means used, and the lack of compilation under one management would diminish the usefulness and the value of the statistics.

But the national bureau could and would work in unison with the State bureaus and become an adjunct of the Census Bureau, furnishing at less expense much more complete and reliable information; for the information would come not only from manufacturers but from laborers as well.

Experience in the States has shown that the information is freely given when once the utility of a bureau of labor statistics is recognized. In one case it is reported that over 71,000 wage-workers made returns of value on the blanks furnished. Only a small number, not included in the above, were rejected on account of imperfection.

It will tend to discourage strikes by furnishing intelligent data as a basis for arbitration. The strikes of 1877 cost the railroads $25,000,000, and it is estimated that if the loss of all property, stock, merchandise, freight, and stoppage of business were added it would make a total of nearly $75,000,000. Concerning arbitration Mr. Brassey, in his work and wages, says:

The result in ninety-five out of one hundred cases brought before the English tribunals is a reconciliation between the parties; and though appeals are permitted to the superior courts of law, they are rarely made. In 1870, 28,000 disputes had been heard, of which no less than 26,800 were satisfactorily settled.

It would materially assist in the solution of the convict-labor question, which to-day is attracting the serious attention of the various States on account of the destruction of our trades through the organized labor of criminals. It will lead to a better sanitary arrangement for the homes and workshops of the mechanic and laborer. It will result in a more general diffusion of knowledge, and in the better education of the young. It will secure an equitable distribution of the products of labor, and remove all cause of strikes and lock-outs. It will promote "the general welfare," and prevent internal strife by furnishing a vehicle for the transmission of grievances to the law-making bodies of the nation. It will encourage the toiling millions to greater effort in developing the resources of this country. It will tend to the promotion of a higher civilization and better citizenship. It will remove one great cause of grievance—that the working people have no adequate means for the collection, compilation, and diffusion of facts relating to their well-being. It will furnish Congress data from which beneficent legislation can be evolved. There are a thousand reasons why this bill should become a law and not one sound reason why it should not.

Pass this bill, and you take one great step in the elevation of the wealth-producers of this country, and its benign effects will penetrate to the homes of the poor laborers of other lands.

INFLUENCE ON LEGISLATION.

There is not a question of legislation connected with the general welfare of the nation in the consideration of which the want of reliable statistics of this character is not felt. The subject which has for the past few days engaged the attention of this House, the subject of tariff legislation, is dependent for its proper solution on the condition of the laboring man, his income, his expenses, his life, and it is impossible to legislate with that discrimination which the welfare of the people requires, because we lack the information necessary to proceed upon. Conflicting statements as to labor and wages, fortified by figures equally irreconcilable, prevent judicious action, and this state of affairs will continue. Intelligent legislation for the great mass of the people will have this obstacle in its way until a national bureau is established, where competent persons will gather from all sides, from the wage-worker as well as the capitalists facts as to the state of labor.

How impotent is Congress to supply the demanded remedy for evils which, although the laboring man sees and feels them, the Representatives and Senators know little of! Is the want of such information not realized? Is it not a fact that everything that has a statistical appearance, no matter what the source is, be it a newspaper article or an official report, is seized upon in a manner, as one writer says, "that is almost pathetic?" For years we have been going on with no definite information on this subject, while every civilized nation has been devoting attention to it; we have fallen behind to the extent that in some cases mere unsigned newspaper articles are published in the RECORD, and have an influence on the result of the pending discussion.

For years we have been promising the laboring classes relief, but generally we have failed to do more than look into the subject and shrink back appalled. And why? Because we do not know the true nature of the evil. We can never know it unless we take the proper means to discover it. Until we take such measures we will have outbreaks of the dissatisfied, loss of life, and destruction of property vastly more in value than the mere pittance which the laboring class asks at our hands; for the wage-workers demand it, and they know what they want. The testimony given by them before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor simply repeats the demands made by their organizations heretofore. They feel that not only the legislator but they themselves would be benefited, educated by such information.

In the only way in which they can speak they have asked this. And can we afford to be deaf to their demands? Are they not the producers of our wealth? Are they not the power in this country? We created a bureau of statistics for commerce, another for agriculture, another to foretell storms, but fail to provide for a bureau that will foretell and enable us to provide for the storms which so often overtake the business world and bring disaster on the great mass of our people. We can hardly tell whether any measure of an economic character will be injurious or beneficial to the 10,000,000 toilers and the 35,000,000 who depend on them.

Who more than they have a claim on our attention? And how little, after all, do they ask? Merely the establishment of a bureau which at a small expense will furnish information more valuable in one year than all the fine-spun theories or dogmatic utterances based upon unreliable facts, or facts which while merely local are given a universal application.

RESOURCES OF OUR COUNTRY.

With a country embracing more than three and a half million square miles of territory; with over 5,000 miles of seacoast; with five great inland seas; with every variety of soil and climate adapted to every product of nature; with mineral wealth of such variety and magnitude that it seems fabulous; with its millions of spindles, its smoking furnaces, and its busy machine-shops; with a population of over 50,000,000 people engaged in developing its inexhaustible resources; with every element that contributes to the grandeur and stability of a great nation, we have deliberately neglected the great factor in the country's development—labor; while we have only been too ready to listen to the request of capital, which we have loaded with a lavish hand with millions in money and whole empires in lands. Of the hundreds of millions of dollars in taxes collected annually we have made a free distribution to every interest except labor; and when the 10,000,000 of wage-workers of the country ask Congress for the pitiful sum of $25,000, that they may be enabled to present their condition to the country, gentlemen rise on this floor in perfect terror at the idea that another bureau is to be ingrafted upon the Government.

LABOR ONLY ASKS FOR SIMPLE JUSTICE.

The wealth-producers of this country have had a long and severe struggle for equal privileges with capital. Their poverty has precluded the possibility of maintaining a lobby to promote their interests in the national Legislature, while capital has been not only able to influence legislation by its paid agents here, but it has been able to secure the columns of the press to promote its interest and the ablest talent the country affords to promulgate its sophistries and weigh down in the scales of popular favor the spasmodic efforts labor has made for a fair hearing.

The wage-workers of this country ask no unfair and inequitable favors; they ask for simple justice. They claim that they have as just a right to have the General Government provide for the gathering and compilation of statistics which relate to their capital—i. e., labor—as any other element of the nation's wealth.

The safety and perpetuity of this Republic rest on the intelligence and patriotism of the working classes.

This House has already shown its sympathy for the labor element by creating a committee on labor, and I have no fears that it will hesitate about passing this bill.

LABOR LAWS OF EUROPE.

Laws exist in nearly all European countries limiting the hours of labor, compelling responsibility of employers for accidents, and prohibiting employment of children except as regulated.

Factory laws of Great Britain, 1877–'78, digested.

Sanitary.—Every factory and workshop to be kept cleanly and free from effluvia. Overcrowding prohibited. Good ventilation prescribed.

Safety.—All hoists, fly-wheels, wheel-races, and gearing to be fenced unless impracticable; impracticability to be proven. Faulty grindstones removable by inspectors. Children not permitted to clean machinery in motion. Children and women not to clean gearing when in motion.

Hours in textile factories.—Young persons and women to be employed no longer than twelve hours, including meal hours, from 6 a. m. to 6 p. m., or from 7 a. m. to 7 p. m., excepting Saturdays, when the hours shall be from 6 a. m. to 1 p. m., or from 7 a. m. to 1.30 p. m. Meal hours, two hours per day, except Saturdays; on Saturdays one-half hour. Shall not work more than four and a half hours without an intermission for meals. In non-textile factories one-half hour less for meals, and on Saturdays hours from 6 a. m. to 2 p. m., with one-half hour for meals. Children shall only be employed half-days or alternate whole days, and not on the same half of the day for two successive weeks, nor on same alternate whole days for two successive weeks. Meal hours to be at the same hours each day, and no child, young person, or woman to be employed during such hours, or be permitted to remain in the working rooms, &c.

Children under 10 years not to be employed.—"Young persons" means persons between 13 and 16 years of age. No working on Sunday excepting in certain cases, when those of the Jewish faith are permitted.

Holidays.—Beside Christmas and Good Friday, there shall be allowed all children, young persons, and women eight half-holidays in each year, or in lieu thereof four whole days, one-half to be between the 15th March and 1st October.

Education of children.—Children shall attend day schools on the days not employed, at least one attendance per week if of the half-day sets, and two attendances if of the alternate day sets. Not on Saturday or holiday. Unless illness or closing of school prevents attendance, the child shall not be employed the following week, when the lost time shall be made up. Employer shall obtain on every Monday a certificate of school attendance before employing the child for the week, the certificate to be shown the inspector. When a child has attained the age of 13 years, and has obtained the proper certificate of proficiency in reading, writing, and arithmetic, the child shall be considered as a 'young person" within the meaning of this act. A surgeon's certificate of the fitness as to age and physical capacity to work must be obtained by the employer within seven days after engaging the person, if the person be under 16 years of age. The employer shall pay for the schooling of the children, as hereinbefore provided, 2 pence a week out of the wages of the child.

Accidents.—In case of accidents resulting in loss of life or injuries employer must notify to surgeon within forty-eight hours; and if in an iron-mill or blast-furnace at once, and the surgeon shall investigate and report to the inspector.

Factories and bake-houses to be painted or whitewashed and walls cleaned periodically.

No sleeping apartment to be on a level and connected with a bake-house unless partitioned off fully, and a window of prescribed size provided for ventilation.

Wherever grinding, glazing, &c., operations are carried on, where dust injurious to the work-people is inhaled, the inspector may have a fan or other mechanical appliance provided suitable and practicable to prevent.

No child, young person, or woman shall be employed in a part of a factory where wet-spinning of flax, &c., is carried on, unless provision for protection from the wetting is made.

Overtime.—In exceptional cases persons 14 years of age or over may be employed fourteen hours per day, including meal hours, provided an additional half-hour is allowed for meals, and provided that no young person or woman shall be so employed overtime more than five days in any one week nor more than forty-eight days in a year.

Uncompleted work, such as perishable, &c., when required, may be completed by extending the time not more than thirty minutes beyond the hours herein fixed.

Night-work.—Males of 14 years and upward may be employed at night not more than twelve hours, including meal hours, as herein provided; and no person so employed shall be employed during the twelve hours immediately preceding or succeeding that period; nor shall male young persons be so employed more than six nights in any two weeks; and the provisions respecting Saturdays and half-holidays, &c., shall not apply to male young persons so employed.

The secretary of state may, in exceptional cases, at his discretion, permit the hours of labor to be changed to from 8 a. m. to 8 p. m. or from 9 a. m. to 9 p. m., provided the change can be made without injury to the young persons or women employed, but this shall not apply to children; and in certain cases males above 16 years may be employed for any nine hours of actual work between 4 a. m. and 10 p. m., and he may permit any other working day than Saturday to be substituted for Saturday; and he may permit Jews who keep Saturday as the Sabbath until sunset to employ young persons and women not later than 9 p. m., and on Sundays if the employés are Jews and were not employed at all on Saturday, provided that the factory, &c., is not open for traffic on Sunday. The inspectors provided for in this act shall have full power to execute the same. Public factories and works are subjected to the same provisions as private establishments. Proper penalties and legal proceedings are provided. The employment of children, young persons, and women, is restricted, and in some cases prohibited, by schedules appended to the act.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] has twenty minutes of his time still remaining.

Mr. HOPKINS. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, there can be no doubt in respect to the gravity and importance of the question embraced in this bill and others of a similar character already pending before the House and which will soon be brought forward for its action. It is broader and more far-reaching in its connection with our social structure and in its effect upon the financial and political future of our Government than almost any other which could be presented to the attention of the social scientist and thoughtful student of political economy, and no legislation upon any subject requires to be more carefully examined and considered. I do not admit the correctness of the conclusion that it has been wholly overlooked and neglected in former legislation, though I believe it is true that it has not received that attention which its importance requires.

Aspirants for public favor have usually been profuse enough in promises of legislative reforms in the interest of the class for whose benefit this and other measures to which I have alluded were professedly introduced, but the complaint is not wholly unfounded that these promises have sometimes been forgotten. It seems now, however, that some of them are about to be redeemed, if I may judge from the number of bills which have been introduced looking to their fulfillment and the zeal manifested in their support by many leading members of the House. I have no doubt but that when this discussion shall go to the country the laboring classes will be startled by the discovery that they have so many and such earnest friends upon this floor. The artisan, the mechanic, and the agriculturist will doubtless be agreeably disappointed and greatly gratified by the discovery, unless indeed they shall learn in the end that this movement has lost its momentum before it confers upon them the real benefits which it now promises.

It is a subject of some regret with me that the tone and temper of the House scarcely a week ago did not seem so friendly to the working classes of the country as I apprehend it will be shown to be before the close of this discussion. This apprehension grows out of the fact that only a few days ago when the committee of which I am a member submitted for the consideration of the House and asked the passage of certain bills, which they believed were demanded by public considerations, and which would have conferred upon the working classes much in advance of the bill now under discussion some of the benefits which it proposes to secure to them, we were most vigorously combated by many gentlemen, who will now, I presume, claim to be the most zealous friends of workingmen.

I insisted then that the hundred millions of dollars of surplus revenue now hoarded away in the Treasury, and not needed for any public purpose, was a dangerous temptation to the host of jobbers always ready to prey upon the public Treasury, and that the expenditure of a small part of it in the erection of public buildings required in the transaction of public business would be a proper disposition of it, while at the same time it would afford employment to a large number of idle artisans and mechanics. These buildings which it was proposed to erect would have been the property of the Government, and therefore the property of the people, thousands of whom would have been benefited by their erection.

The construction of public works upon which the labor of the people could be employed is no new theory in the history of other governments, though it seems a novel one in our own in the estimation of many distinguished members of this House. For myself I see no better method for the expenditure of surplus revenue, and none other by which the public interest and that of the laboring element of the country can be better harmonized and more properly advanced. But these views were most vigorously combated by my distinguished friend the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the no less distinguished statesman from Missouri, and for their advocacy I was charged with being a jobber and log-roller, though I scarcely know what significance should be given to these terms when thus applied.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. To what gentleman from Missouri does the gentleman from Tennessee refer?

Mr. YOUNG. To that excellent gentleman, your colleague, Mr. BUCKNER.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think my friend from Tennessee misapprehends. I do not remember that any such terms were used on the occasion to which he refers.

Mr. YOUNG. Not by you, judge; but terms equivalent to them were used by other gentlemen who were your allies on that occasion.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I feel a deep and sincere interest in everything that affects the well-being or advances the prosperity of the laboring classes, for I know that as compared with that of others their lot is a hard one, and that by the hardest and most continuous toil they are enabled to win the comforts of life and the advantages of moral and educational training. I know that wise statesmanship exerted in their behalf has not infrequently been overshadowed and defeated in its efforts by the shallowest and most disreputable demagogy. It has been a fruitful theme for the declamation of the most noisy and pretentious demagogues, while the real friends of labor are driven from its support by the intrusion of those who resort to its advocacy for the temporary popular favor which they hope it will bring.

I am gratified to know, however, that the management of this bill is in the hands of a gentleman whose high character and sense of public duty raises him above influences of this character. Hence it is that I propose, with some trifling exceptions and amendments, to give this measure my most cheerful and hearty support, appreciating as I do the delicacy of many of the questions which it involves and the narrow line which separates them from the recognized rights of the Federal Government and the reserved constitutional powers of the States. However, little regard is too often given to the limitations imposed upon legislation by the Federal Constitution. I am myself not disposed in any emergency, however urgent, to go beyond them, and in that aspect I have given this measure a careful consideration, the result of which has brought me to the conclusion that Congress has the full constitutional warrant to acquire such information as will aid in wise legislation upon this subject, without in any way encroaching upon the ground hedged around by those guarantees which protect the field of exclusive State jurisdiction.

While I agree in the main with the provisions of this bill, I do not believe that all of them are best calculated to insure the full accomplishment of the object which it is designed to attain; as between every character of labor and all classes of laborers there is an inseparable identity and close community of interest that should not be disturbed nor divided by enforced and unnecessary distinctions. This would be as unfortunate and as hurtful to each and every class as would be an antagonism between capital and the aggregate of all labor. Every element of labor requires the same protection, the same fostering care, and the same safeguards against the aggressions of capital and the combination of unfriendly influences that any single one of them has the right to demand.

And another thing it is important to observe: every class of laboring men and every one who toils for wages is more nearly and intimately interested than all others in the enactment of laws simple and easy of application, effective in their operation, and cheap in their administration. Hence it is that I propose to amend this bill so as to conform to these important conditions. One of the complaints against the legislation of the past two decades is that its tendency has been to enlarge the machinery of government, to multiply its different parts, and to render it more unwieldy, less effective, and more expensive in its administration. Under the four branches into which it is divided by our organic law there are already six great departments, all except one presided over by a Cabinet minister, by which they are administered by the aid of an army of subordinates and employés, and these Departments are constantly increasing in the extent of their powers and jurisdiction, while the roll of employés grows larger and larger from year to year.

A quarter of a century ago our whole Government was administered by less than 25,000 officers and employés; now more than 100,000 names are borne upon the official roll of the Government in its various departments. This result has, to be sure, been brought about in some measure by the large accession to our population during that time, as well as by the vast increase of our wealth, and consequent large volume of public business. These results will no doubt continue to flow from the same causes in the future, but we should see to it that their growth is not stimulated by unwise and careless legislation.

We should create no more governmental departments, but should furnish to those we have any additional facilities needed in the transaction of public business. There is no branch of the public service which requires the creation of a new department. If anything more is desired to enable those already in existence to carry into effective operation any law pertaining to matters now under their jurisdiction, it can be furnished by the creation of a subordinate bureau. We already have a Department of Agriculture charged by law with supervision over everything pertaining to the vast farming interests of the country, that branch of industry in which nearly two-thirds of our toiling laborers are employed, so that the greatest labor interests we have are now under the jurisdiction of a department charged by existing laws with the duty of aiding, fostering, and developing it. Why should there be another department charged with similar duties toward another class of laborers?

Why not amend this bill so as to make it provide for a bureau instead of a department? To make it conform to this idea I propose the following amendments: After the word "maintain," in line 3 on page 1 of the bill, strike out the words "at the seat of Government," and insert in lieu thereof the word "Agricultural;" and strike out the word "department," in line 4, and insert in lieu thereof the word "bureau;" so that the bill will read:

That there shall be established in the Agricultural Department a bureau of labor statistics, which shall be under the charge of a commissioner of labor statistics, &c.

Then I propose, after the word "mine," in line 30 on page 2 of the bill, to add the word "farm," and further after the word "of," in line 46, page 3 of the bill, strike out the words "labor statistics," and insert in lieu thereof the word "agriculture," and after the word "clerk," in the same line and on the same page, add the words, "of bureau of labor statistics;" so that it will read:

The Commissioner of Agriculture shall appoint a chief clerk for the bureau of labor statistics, who shall receive a salary of $2,000 a year, &c.

And I propose still further to amend by adding after the word "writing," in line 55 of page 3 of the bill, the words "through the Commissioner of Agriculture;" so that it will read:

That the commissioner of labor statistics shall annually make a report in writing through the Commissioner of Agriculture to the President, &c.

I propose these amendments, Mr. Chairman, because I believe it is unnecessary to create any more departments in this Government, and because of my belief that the Agricultural Department should have charge of the whole question of labor, whether in the mines, the workshops, or the fields. The fewer departments we have the less cumbersome the machinery of government will be, the less extensive its structure and the easier and smoother will be its workings. There is no reason, that I can see, why all the questions contained in this bill may not be safely intrusted for investigation and management to a bureau in the Department of Agriculture, the head of which is so well fitted for the superintendence and direction of the work. Besides the high qualification possessed by the present Commissioner of Agriculture for work of this character, he has at his command all the agents and facilities for its speedy and successful prosecution, and under his direction it can of course be done far more cheaply than by the employment of new agents wholly unacquainted with the field in which they will have to operate. There is already a proposition before Congress to make the Agricultural Department equal in dignity, as it already is in importance, with all the other Departments of the Government, and to advance the Commissioner to the rank and grade of a Cabinet minister, and it is only a question of time when this proposition will become a law. Where, then, can be the necessity for the creation of still another department for the purpose alone of taking in charge the interest of one-third of the laboring element of the country? And another and equally cogent reason why I urge the amendment I offer was outlined in the beginning of my remarks when I submitted the proposition that there was an identity and indivisible unity in the interest of all the laboring classes which should not be disturbed by any legislation under which it might be divided.

There is already a feeling of antagonism springing up between the workers in the mines and the manufacturers and the tillers of the soil, the laborers in the broad fields of agriculture, growing out of the teachings of the advocates of different theories in respect to a great question of political economy. It has been maintained, with great show of truth, by some of the most distinguished leaders of public thought at the present day, that the tariff legislation of the country during the last twenty years at least has been calculated to build up the manufacturing while it has dwarfed the agricultural interests.

Whether this be true or not I will not now stop to inquire, but that a large proportion of agricultural laborers believe it to be true can not be questioned. So that while one class of laborers may approve this system of legislation, the other condemns it because of their belief that it unjustly discriminates against them and their interests. It is not wise, therefore, to widen this breach nor to strengthen this incipient antagonism between elements that should be so closely knitted together by the enactment of a law that would even seem to afford benefits to one class which are not equally bestowed upon another. Let us rather strengthen and preserve that natural unity which should exist between the workshop and the field, between the interest of the farmer and that of the mechanic, so that both forces will move forward in harmony in developing the wealth and resources of our entire country.

Pass this bill in its present form and the farmer may conclude that there is to be still further discriminations against him under cover of Federal legislation; but amend it as I propose, so that it will embrace within its provisions every branch of productive industry, and then it will meet the approval of both classes of laborers.

One school of political economists teaches the doctrine that the wisest statesmanship requires the enactment of such laws in respect to public revenue as will give protection to the manufactories of the country and consequent increased wages to their operatives, while on the other hand the opposing school maintain that no industry of this country requires protection and that free trade gives the greatest prosperity and highest reward for labor.

It is not material to my present argument to inquire which one of these theories is the true one, but it will not be denied by any that that system of legislation is the wisest one which stimulates and protects all industries and all labor alike. Perhaps the legislation here proposed is not so direct and practical as it might be, but still it is one step in the direction of a new system of legislation, by which a subject of great public concern will ultimately receive that attention which its interest and importance clearly demand.

For myself I would have moved over a shorter and more direct line toward the object which we propose to accomplish. I would at once recommend inaugurating a system of public works upon an enlarged and liberal scale, to be constructed of such character and at such places as the public interest requires.

I would erect a public building at every place where the Government has need for one and pays a rental that would amount to 3 per cent. on the cost of building. This would be a measure of real economy, though it should involve the expenditure of three or four millions of dollars. I would thus enhance the dignity and respectability of the Government and give it a stronger claim upon popular affection, while at the same time hundreds of artisans and mechanics would be given employment.

We have stretching along either bank of the Mississippi River a vast alluvial region, reaching from Cairo to the Gulf of Mexico, an empire in extent and a mine of fabulous, inexhaustible wealth; if once protected, the wild deluge of waters which flow from all the sources of the Mississippi and spread out without hinderance over the delta. State and individual resources are inadequate for the construction of such works as are required to hold the flood in check and protect the lowlands of the Mississippi from annual inundation. I would have the Government embark in this great enterprise, which would add hundreds of millions in value to the aggregate wealth of the country, while the money thus wisely expended would give useful employment to many thousands of hardy laborers.

The money now accumulated in the Treasury was gathered from the people, it belongs to them, and they have a right to demand that it shall be expended in such way as will bring to them some share of the benefits its distribution would dispense.

The House, however, did not see proper a short time since to act upon this theory, though in the future it may be induced to do so; but in the mean time let this bill, amended as I have suggested, be enacted into a law, and it will in my judgment meet with more general approval than any other passed by Congress for many years past.

I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD].

Mr. BLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] a question if he will allow me.

Mr. YOUNG. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. What does the gentleman think will be the probable effect of this appropriation of $25,000? I notice that the bill provides—

> The commissioner of labor statistics shall appoint a chief clerk, who shall receive a salary of $2,000 per annum, and such other employés as the commissioner may deem necessary for the successful working of the department: Provided, That the total expense shall not exceed $25,000 per annum.

Mr. YOUNG. I have not given my attention so much to that matter of detail in connection with the bill as I have to some others. It has been carefully considered by a committee of this House, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS], the chairman of the committee, can answer that question better than I can.

Mr. BLAND. Why could not the committee itself provide for the number of employés and their compensation without appropriating a lump sum of $25,000 to be expended at the discretion of this commissioner?

Mr. HOPKINS. Simply because the committee is unable to say how many employés will be required and the amount of money that may be needed. The man to be selected for this position ought to be generally familiar with all the details and should organize this bureau according to his best judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] is entitled to the floor for ten minutes.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, so far as the object of this bill is to collect information which may increase the facilities and opportunities of the laboring man I approve it. But the bill contains other things which I do not approve. If the sole object of the measure were to show to the men engaged in agricultural, manufacturing, and other industrial pursuits where they can obtain the best compensation for their labor, it would commend itself to the unqualified approbation of every patriot. It would commend itself to the approval of every man who loves his country, for upon the labor of our country in its different departments the happiness and prosperity of this people depend. But as I am not thoroughly convinced this alone is the object, I have some hesitation in giving an unqualified support to this bill.

Permit me to explain a little further before I go into the general remarks I propose to make. If the object of this bill is to point out and show to the cupidity of men they may go where cheap labor can be found abroad and bring it here to come into competition with the honest labor of the American people, then so far as I am concerned I am utterly opposed so it. I am in favor of the laborer getting the highest wages for his work fairly and honestly. I do not mean by unequal tariff laws, by such laws as will make one part of the community pay a portion of what he earns to support another part of the community. I am in favor of the laborer receiving the highest compensation in a fair and equitable way.

A word on the question of protection, the protection of American industry. The whole object of that system is disguised; there is not a word of genuine truth about it. It is all disguise; it is a fraud and cheat. The whole thing is wrong.

Talk to me about protecting American labor; that I must protect it and you must protect it. If I buy a shirt or pair of pantaloons or anything else I must protect it in the price I give. How? By the money which I pay. Why give them high prices for things we buy and which we consume when they say they do not need protection, as was ably argued by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] who is standing before me? If they do not need protection, in the name of God why give it to them? If they do not need protection, why not let me keep my money in my pocket and instead of only buying one shirt let me have it so I can buy two shirts or two pairs of pantaloons or twice as much of anything I may need. Why, let me keep it if they do not need protection.

If we really have come to the time when cotton cloth needs no protection, then let us repeal the law and impose taxation for the purpose of revenue only. That is the way to protect labor.

Let the man who plows, let the man who uses the hammer in the shops, let the man who performs manual labor in the country, receive that protection which equal, just, and honest laws would give him, and let him buy whatever he wishes as cheaply as possible. If that is the kind of protection which gentlemen want, if that is the protection this bill is in favor of, when I shall become convinced of it I will vote for it; but I will withhold my vote until I am so convinced. I hope gentlemen will use an argument to convince me of that fact, as I would do nothing to destroy the success of labor.

The other day we heard a powerful argument made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] in reference to this subject of labor. I suppose, on the establishment of this bureau, he wants some more statistics of the kind he presented. I am tired of such things so far as I am concerned. We had an able argument from him showing the people were so poor in London they had to live worse than the beasts of the forest; degraded, ruined. Poor old England, how sorry I was for her! Was it the tariff made them so poor, or the lack of a tariff? We all know now, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania knows just as well as anybody else when he gets sober, clear, and candid on this proposition—he knows full well it is the feudal system of England, the land-holding system there, by which a few men own all the land while the great mass of the poor people have to work with no homes to live in, nobody to protect them; that it is because there the few disregard the many, the few taking all the profit while all the labor is done by the poor people; it is for this reason they live like the beasts of the forests. I am sorry they are in that condition, but I can not afford to bring them here and put them in competition with our own honest labor on our farms and in our workshops.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BELFORD. I now send to the desk and ask to have read as a part of my remarks an amendment which I desire to offer to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the bill is not yet open to amendment; but if desired this will be read in the time of the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BELFORD. That is my request, as I desire to speak with reference to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment suggested by the gentleman from Colorado will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no railway corporation or manufacturing establishment shall be allowed to import foreign labor to compete in employment with American citizens.

Mr. HOPKINS. I make the point of order against that that the bill is not open to amendment at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has been read only for information.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state a few facts bearing directly upon the question of American labor and showing the importance of such an amendment as that suggested. A few years ago the manufacturers in New England imported from China a large number of laborers to displace American citizens.

Mr. RUSSELL. How many?

Mr. BELFORD. I do not know how many. The fact is the substantive thing with which I am dealing, and whether they imported one or whether they imported one hundred thousand, the fact stands there like Jupiter blazing in the skies. [Laughter.]

What has happened in Cincinnati lately? I had the honor to state to this House the other day that while that was a riot presumably originating in the interest of the execution of the law in the case of a confessed murderer, it was really based on far different conditions, and yet the next day when I read the Commercial Gazette I found that my statement was absolutely verified, and that the alleged cause was merely an excuse for the beginning of communism in this country. And every gentleman who read that paper, who read the full report of all of those proceedings, will concur with me in that statement.

What occurred yesterday at Pittsburgh? Why, a warfare between the Polanders, imported by the manufacturers of Pittsburgh to drive American citizens out of employment. They had a riot, a fixed battle; lines were drawn; there were wounds given and received. American citizens under the domination of these corporations are helpless, and they have no fair chance to earn their honest bread and butter.

Mr. BLAND. Then the gentleman, I suppose, will agree that protection does not protect after all.

Mr. BELFORD. Why, they had a meeting in Pittsburgh, my friend, and at that meeting in Pittsburgh the operatives of that city passed a series of resolutions wherein they solemnly declared that while the tariff system protected the manufacturers the wages of the operatives were constantly going down. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That is exactly what I want to bring to the attention of this House and to the attention of the country. What we want to do is to take into our own hands the hand of labor and lift it up until it reaches the glimmering of the morning sunrise. That is what we did in 1860 when we lifted from the humble cabin the slave and made him a free man.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. BELFORD. I should like to have just one minute more. [Cries of "Go on!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire the chair to submit his request?

Mr. KING. I move that the gentleman be allowed to continue.

Several members objected.

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield now ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN].

Mr. YOUNG. How much time have the opposition?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty minutes remain in opposition to the bill. Is it desired to consume the remainder of the time in favor of it now?

Mr. WELLER. I would like to inquire how much time remains both in favor of and against the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty minutes in favor and thirty minutes against.

Mr. WELLER. I shall ask recognition in favor of the bill at the proper time.

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Chairman, I shall probably not consume the ten minutes which have been allowed to me by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I trust when a vote is taken upon the bill that it will be passed substantially as it has been matured and perfected by the committee. The committee spent considerable time in perfecting the bill, and so far as I am individually concerned I would prefer to see it killed and voted down altogether rather than see it mutilated by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee. What we want is a separate and independent department. We think we are entitled to at least that consideration. Nothing less will be satisfactory to the great body of citizens who are asking for this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I doubt if there has ever been before the American Congress a question of greater importance, or one that more directly concerns the welfare of humanity, than that which is being now considered by this House. It will be impossible in the few brief moments I am permitted to speak to do more than call your attention to the general scope and purpose of the measure now under discussion. It is a generally accepted axiom that bad laws and evil legislation originate in and spring from that cupidity and selfishness that has ever been a predominant characteristic in human nature. This proposition is only partially true. A very considerable portion of the imperfect and vicious legislation of which the people justly complain may be traced to a lack of reliable data and accurate knowledge upon the part of the average lawmaker of a true conception or comprehensive understanding of the science of society or that science which M. Compte more compactly and succinctly designates sociology—a science which concerns itself with all the various phenomena incident to man in society, and resulting from the multiform actions and peculiar and changing conditions of collective masses of the human species existing in social life.

The great error and mistake of the average statesman is the assumption that society should be conformed to statute law—that every enactment of our legislative bodies, whether based upon correct principles or not, should be in effect an iron mold into which society should be violently forced and driven and be compelled to adapt itself to the conditions of the law. Following this false and erroneous theory of legislation, our lawmakers frequently enact laws in blind ignorance of the complex or even elementary principles of social science. Laws are enacted simply to meet necessities and exigencies as they arise without reference to the causes which occasioned them. Like the empirical physician, the lawmaker too frequently attempts to cure a diseased body-politic by the enactment of laws based upon symtomatical manifestations. The true theory of legislation, however, as I understand it, is based upon the idea that laws should be enacted in accordance with and suited to the phenomenal conditions of the social state of the people to be governed by them; that instead of endeavoring to control and manage events after their occurrence, the province of wise statesmanship is to prevent future evils by legislation based on a thorough comprehension of existing social conditions—that is, to determine by statistical and speculative inquiry the organic causes of impending or threatened social disorders, and what under all the circumstances are the general conditions of legislative operations best calculated to prevent them.

To aid the legislator in this direction is the principal object of this bill. The creation of the bureau proposed in this bill will lead to a greater, profounder, and more extended knowledge of the general character, habits, manners, customs, and dispositions of the people, their social status, their progress in civilization and intelligence, their material and sanitary condition, their advancement in moral and mental culture, their different classifications as to laborers, skilled and unskilled, professional men, capitalists, and non-producers, as well as the production and distribution of wealth. The object of the bureau tersely stated is to promote a more general diffusion and better comprehension of social science. Sociological science is based upon statistics which collects, collates, arranges, and compares facts, from which the statesman ascertains, and without which he can not ascertain, those great principles in accordance with which the state must act if it would promote and foster the well-being and happiness of its citizens. It is from this source alone that the political economist can determine an equitable and just rule to govern the production and distribution of wealth.

It is hardly possible that any gentleman upon this floor will deny that correct and systematized information of the character here outlined is not essentially and absolutely necessary to a comprehensive knowledge of social subjects and to a correct understanding and just conception of the exact condition of the country and the legislation necessary to more effectually advance the material and social well-being of the people. To my mind such data and information are of the greatest importance in tracing and determining the various circumstances by which evils and wrongs creep into society, as well as pointing out the safest and surest means of removing them, because from that source alone can be ascertained a knowledge of the action and reaction which is forever taking place among the different and manifold elements of which society is composed.

There can be no doubt but that experimental, empirical legislation, which at best is but tentative in character and unsatisfactory in results, may be directly traced to a lack of the information and data which it is proposed this bureau shall furnish. Of course we can infer causes from their effects, or through the medium of their effects observe causes; we may even determine what effect a certain cause is capable of producing; but we can not predict effects or trace causes, because of the absence of the necessary reliable data and by reason of the scarcity of statistical generalization we are unable to tell the number of causes affecting society which exist or the frequency of their occurrence. I firmly believe that the laws governing the science of sociology are as fixed as those of astronomy. I do not, however, contend that statistics will enable us to so thoroughly understand social science as to be able to predict or anticipate history with unfailing accuracy; but I do claim, and the claim is supported by such men as Mill, Spencer, and Compte, that a comprehensive knowledge of sociology will enable the statesman to understand or determine by or through what causes a state has been made what it is—whether it is tending to any changes, and what these changes may be; what effect existing conditions will have upon the future, and by what means these effects may be modified or prevented or an entirely different class of effects produced.

It is impossible to overestimate the value of statistical science. The laws which govern the intricate and complex fabric of human society can not be determined by any system of reasoning known to us; we are forced necessarily to proceed by induction from facts collected by some authorized agent of the character indicated in the bill. We have already a bureau connected with one of the departments of the Government which collects and collates statistics relating to the material resources of the country. Only a few days ago we passed a bill creating a bureau of animal industry, the object being to prevent and eradicate diseases among animals. We have manifested a desire to improve the sanitary condition of hogs and other animals, and it is strange indeed that a proposition to improve the sanitary condition of human beings should meet with opposition. History informs us that when Titus solemnized the inauguration of the Roman Amphitheater by a hundred days of feasting and brutal carnage, 9,000 animals perished upon the bloody arena; the same history is silent as to the number of human sacrifices during these hundred Roman holidays. Is it possible that we, like the Romans, are more concerned about the health and lives of animals than of human beings?

I always believed that the great object of legislation should be man. The Republic is simply an aggregation of men, and in the ratio these men advance in intelligence and morality are the foundations of the Republic made strong, and enduring. Civilization, progress, and national advancement are not measured by powerful combinations of wealth, manufactures, and products as much as by manhood. Man is undoubtedly the true object of legislation, and to produce better men, freer men, men of more advanced thought and civilization, should be the object of every law placed upon the statute-books of the Republic. We have to-day full and ample statistics concerning the growth, prosperity, material resources and wealth of the country, but there is nothing to show the sanitary, intellectual, or financial condition of the vast army of men who create and produce all this wealth.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] recently submitted a very able and valuable report to this House to accompany the bill to aid temporarily in support of the common schools of the country. This report shows that there are over 6,000,000 of persons above 10 years of age who can not write. It further shows that nearly 2,000,000 of the voters of the Republic are illiterate. These facts are simply appalling. What remedy do you propose? The Committee on Education say appropriate $10,000,000 to aid the public schools. Why, sir, we expend for educational purposes now three times more per capita than any nation on the globe. You can not remove illiteracy by building magnificent school-houses and equipping them with competent instructors and all the educational appliances known to modern times. Something more is demanded. You must secure a school attendance proportionable to your population.

In 1882 the school population of the United States was 15,302,862, of which number but 9,729,189 were attending the elementary schools. Considerable less than half a million were attending normal schools, colleges, and universities, leaving over 5,000,000 of the school population not attending schools of any kind or character. You do not need more money as much as you need a large and better school attendance. I am fully convinced a bureau of labor statistics would show that these 5,000,000 of boys and girls of school age are wearing out their young lives in workshops, mines, and factories instead of attending school. If these children are compelled to labor by the pressure of necessity the country ought to know it. If the country would conform its legislation to the doctrine of Paley—that the "interest of the whole of society is binding upon every part of it"—it must determine what are the needs of each and every part of it in order that a rightful knowledge of the whole may be ascertained, and in no way can this be more surely accomplished than by the establishment of this bureau.

If the members of this House believe with Bentham that "the happiness of the individuals of whom a community is composed—that is, their pleasures and security—is the sole end which the legislator ought to have in view, the sole standard in conformity with which each individual ought as far as depends upon the legislature be made to fashion his behavior," they will favor the establishment of this bureau in order that future legislators may be able to comprehend what will best promote the pleasure and best establish the security of the individuals of whom the whole body-politic is composed. The value of statistical information has long been appreciated by the leading minds of this and other countries.

In his preliminary report to the Eighth Census, Superintendent Kennedy, a very able statistician, in recommending the establishment of a general bureau of statistics, says:

> The labors of a statistical bureau would most essentially contribute to the increase of sound knowledge upon all subjects connected with national and international affairs among the people. The theories, often conflicting, of political economists would give place to the practical results of experience, the sober truth of figures, and the unerring demonstrations of facts; the true interests of the people of the country, as a people one and indivisible, would be perceived and understood. Knowledge of the most important kind would be given to the community; additional power, the result of knowledge, be placed in the hands of the legislature; the welfare of the country advanced by its interests being understood, and legislation would be consistent and onward, uniformly conducing to individual happiness and national honor and prosperity.

In 1884 this House referred the matter of the creation of a statistical bureau to a select committee, such a bureau having been frequently recommended to Congress by Presidents and heads of Departments. The committee to whom the matter was referred made a very able report, in which this language occurs:

> The importance of statistical knowledge is proved by the circumstance that scarcely any civilized government exists in the world where a department or bureau has not been established for the purpose of collecting, recording, and arranging statistical facts. * * * Correct and extensive statistical information is no less necessary to the mass of the people, in order that they may desire, appreciate, and understand correct legislation, than it is for the legislator to enable him to comprehend and to promote the best interests of his constituents.

The Journal of the London Statistical Society says that—

> As all things on earth were given to man for his use, and all things in creation were so ordained as to contribute to his advantage and comfort, and as whatever affects man individually affects also man in a state of society, it follows that statistics enter more or less into every branch of science, and form that part of each which immediately connects it with human interests.

The value of this kind of information being so apparent, and the necessity for its collection and dissemination being so urgent as we have seen, Congress has already provided, in a measure at least, for its collection and diffusion among the people. But the present legislation on this subject is more than defective. We have some general statistical information on illiteracy, but nothing definite as to the causes which produce it. Information of a reliable character on pauperism is very meager, and data as to the causes of pauperism more meager still, if not wholly worthless. Our criminal statistics are not entirely reliable, and even if they were they are valueless because reliable data as to causes are absolutely wanting. This bill proposes to remedy these defects in our present legislation. For illustration, let us take a given manufacturing community in which strikes and "lock-outs" frequently occur. American artisans and mechanics, as a rule, are industrious, educated, and intelligent men, who will not resort to "strikes" unless grave and strong reasons impel them to do so.

If you investigate with a view to discovering what these reasons are, you will find in almost every instance that the compensation received by these men is wholly inadequate and not commensurate with their daily necessities. You will find them poorly housed and poorly fed, as well as illy clad, living from hand to mouth, and in debt to the butcher and grocer. To them the theater, the lecture-room, or any of the other pleasures which make life bearable are unknown. They certainly understand that their misery and poverty are due to the insufficient remuneration received for their labor. They plead and beg for better wages, and being refused, a strike is the result. The poverty of the strikers is then the cause of this economic disturbance. By further inquiry we can ascertain the cause of the poverty. You can easily find the amount of capital invested and employed in this manufacturing community, including the cost of the plant, the amount required and used in the purchase of material, the payment of labor and other expenses. You can also ascertain the net earning of this capital, and if you find it to be largely in excess of the natural or legitimate increase of wealth in the country, if you find the capitalist and stockholder receiving large dividends upon small investments, you will have no difficulty in locating the cause of the existing poverty. A sufficient amount of wealth has been produced to adequately compensate labor and leave a fair and reasonable profit to the capital invested; but this wealth being unequally distributed, the poverty of the producers of the wealth is the inevitable result.

I am aware that some employers are opposed to inquiries and investigations of this character, but unless they are plundering and robbing their workingmen the inquiry can do them no injury; for should an inquiry of this character demonstrate that invested capital was not receiving more than its fair share of the joint production, that information would prevent strikes, as the men would understand that the employer was not responsible for the inadequacy of their compensation. In such a case further inquiry might disclose the fact that low wages was due to the ruinous competition of foreign manufacturers, who, having the advantages of cheap capital and pauper labor, were able, owing to the benign influences and advantages of free-trade legislation, to undersell the home manufacturer in his own market, unless he sold his products at a figure which left no margin for his capital and no adequate wage fund from which his employés could be paid; and I may say right here that, no matter how much the necessities of the times and the exigencies of the public demand tariff revision and tariff reform, if indeed such revision and reform are at all demanded, no just standard for such revision and reform can be determined until we are in possession of such data and information as will enable us to comprehend the comparative difference between the wages and cost of living in the manufacturing centers of America and the wages and cost of living in the manufacturing centers of Europe.

If the slightest revision of existing tariff legislation reduces the compensation of a single American workman it ought not to be made, for that state is surely retrograding and already on the verge of dissolution which cheapens its consumable commodities at the expense of its producers, or which builds up vast, powerful, and wealthy corporations or gigantic private fortunes at the expense of the great mass of the people.

If we could undersell the world—

Said the late Mr. Greeley—in iron or cloth by means which kept their producers ignorant, ill-fed, socially depressed, and morally degraded, we could not afford to accept a commercial or industrial advantage on such terms. Cheap shoes and hats are desirable, but not at the cost of generations of shivering, famishing, illiterate shoemakers and hatters.

It is true that those who advocate cheap commodities disclaim any intention of desiring such commodities at the expense of American producers. We differ materially, I might say radically, in our opinions as to what will be the effect of a still further reduction of tariff duties upon the wages of American artisans and mechanics; but if we were in possession of the facts and information which it is the province of this bureau to collate and diffuse among the people we would certainly have a clearer comprehension of the wisest and most politic course to pursue in matters of tariff legislation. Because of the lack of information of this character we differ on most all economic, social, and political questions.

Very recently the country was horrified by the details of a great riot which occurred in the city of Cincinnati. A distinguished Senator, Mr. GIBSON, in a speech upon the Senate educational bill, claimed that riots were more or less caused by illiteracy. From my experience and the lights I have I am forced to differ with the distinguished Senator. The fact is there is a large number of people in this country to-day living in the most abject poverty—they are without homes, and in many instances the very necessaries of life. It is quite natural to suppose that this class is becoming dissatisfied with the existing order of things. How large this class is we do not know, but we do know that the more intelligent a dissatisfied element is the more dangerous it is to the society where it exists.

The Nihilistic society of Russia is almost wholly recruited from the most intelligent classes. If we can remove the cause of the dissatisfaction by improving the material condition of that class the question of education will give us but little concern. In view of the frequence of strikes and riots, it becomes a matter of the greatest importance to the country to know the precise status of the vast bodies of toilers who are crowding into our large manufacturing cities. We ought to know what proportion of our laboring people is fugitive in character and what proportion is permanent in character.

The safest citizen is the man whose interest in the state depends upon and grows out of a property consideration. The man who owns his own domicile, and whose wife and children do not suffer for bread or clothing, is generally a safe and reliable citizen, and is not apt to apply the torch to the roof of his neighbor's house, as such an act would endanger the safety of his own.

If it is true, as it is claimed, that the property and wealth of the country are rapidly passing into the hands of a small percentage of the people, and that the masses are daily growing poorer and more depressed, the statesman ought to know it.

The centralization of wealth means the centralization of political power, and the centralization of political power marks the decline of and possible death of republican institutions in this country. A republican form of government in any country can be but of short duration when 5 per cent. of its people own over 60 per cent. of its property and wealth; and yet it is confidently asserted that that is the condition of things in the United States to-day.

If this be true, we can readily perceive the causes which lead to economic disturbances, strikes, and riots. One or two additional considerations and I am done.

If the political economist desires to increase the productive power of the State, he will favor the creation of the bureau proposed by this bill in order to determine whether the producers of the country, or, in other words, the laborers, may not by the grinding process of unceasing toil and the ill effects of insufficient food be undergoing constant and permanent deterioration, and what are the necessary means to produce a countervailing effect.

Jules Simon ascribed the immorality of France to the necessity which drove the mother from her home and forced her into workshops and factories. If our moralists, social philosophers, and churchmen would advance morality, social and individual virtue, they will favor the creation of this bureau, so that the world may know to what extent women are employed in the workshops and factories of the United States, and to what extent such employment contributes to the debasement of womanhood, and what effect such debasement will have upon the future of the Republic.

I again repeat, we have no reliable or accurate data, knowledge, or information upon the various questions here enumerated; and I insist that in the absence of such data and information we are not qualified to legislate as wisely as the best interests of the people of the country, "as a people one and indivisible," demand.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the Commissioner of Agriculture has stated this very day that at this very time he has sent out numerous inquiries all over this country for the purpose of getting the very information which this bill proposes. A gentleman from Ohio representing a manufacturing establishment stated at my seat that from his own establishment he had furnished information as to labor in his factory. The Agricultural Department at this very time is gathering the statistics sought. In addition we have the Bureau of Statistics, which might do this very work. When asked why not allow this to be added to the work of the Agricultural Department, the answer is that they are overworked. Now, how easy it would be to add clerks to that Department with a view to collecting this information if it shall be found that what the Commissioner of Agriculture is doing at this very time is unsatisfactory on account of want of clerical force.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] argued that we had a Bureau of Mining, a Bureau of Agriculture, a Bureau of Education, &c. Well, sir, I think instead of our concluding that we should have some more of them because we have been multiplying them pretty rapidly, we had better conclude that we have been getting very far beyond what had been the practice of the Government from the beginning until very recent times.

The gentleman has put a provision into the bill that the expenditures for the first year shall not exceed $25,000. For what purpose? The gentleman himself admits, and it is our own experience, that he can not know to what proportions this bureau is to grow. I remember, sir, in the Forty-fourth Congress a small appropriation of about $18,000 was made for the Fish Commission and it has grown up into its hundreds of thousands. In all these matters you have but to sow the seed on the simplest sod and it grows and ramifies in every direction.

I think in view of the fact that the Commissioner of Agriculture is doing this work now, and that we have a bureau specially devoted to statistics, the very class of statistics which this bill contemplates being designated—labor engaged in manufactures—that we have no occasion to add to the expense in this direction.

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, I have no faith in the information when gathered. My observation is that these bureaus when created instead of being used for obtaining information impartial in its character are designed to facilitate some political thought. The reports of consuls upon the subject of labor, the communications coming from the State Department upon the subject of labor, make comparisons, nominal comparisons merely. For instance, you have information of what labor is worth in America. Then you have it stated what it is worth in England or Germany by a nominal comparison of values in dollars. The practical sense of every gentleman tells him that you might just as well undertake to compare the value of labor in this country at this day with what it was in 1863 or 1864 with a depreciated currency. Just as much truth would be elicited from that comparison as is elicited from these comparisons of the values of labor in different countries. A dollar serves a very different purpose here from what it does in France, and a different purpose in France from what it does in England or in Germany.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir; if it is a brief one.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I wish to ask the gentleman a question for information. I would like him to inform the House, if he will, what political thought he thinks this bill intends to promote.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I have not yet said this bill is intended to promote any political thought. I have said my experience has been that these bureaus were utilized for the purpose of advancing some political thought. I remember when the publication of the consular reports was authorized and I know what followed from them; and I defy any gentleman to take those reports on labor statistics and gather from them any principle worth acting upon.

Mr. MILLIKEN rose.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not yield further. One of the objects declared in this bill is to get from your consuls information. That is being done to-day. They are constantly communicating to the State Department such information. Then why do you want to duplicate it here?

Another thing. The gentleman from Pennsylvania said in his speech they wanted to get labor reports from the different foreign governments. Why, sir, I supposed most of those reports were accessible now in the Congressional Library; that is, when such statistics are gathered by the Government. The German Government has no bureau of this sort. But I apprehend that we may find the reports from Great Britain and France, and almost all the countries where such bureaus exist at all. Then why should a provision of that kind be inserted here?

I stated a while ago that I believed these bureaus generally were utilized for the purpose of representing some political thought. I alleged that the consular reports and the information through the State Department have been utilized for that purpose. We appointed a tariff commission to get information exactly analogous to this, and what was the result? And whom did you have upon that commission? The great body of them were men representing manufactures. The agricultural interests of this country were represented by one man upon that commission. The information obtained was all on a given line. If we want information on the subject of labor, I desire the House of Representatives, whenever it should be deemed necessary to get it, to do as the Senate did last year—send men of all political complexions, representing every political thought and political interest, to go forth and get that information. But I want no such information as is likely to be obtained in the way proposed here.

Again, sir, the bill proposes to make inquiries as to the sanitary condition of laborers and as to their educational condition.

Mr. EATON. Why should we make these inquiries if we are not to promote the condition of the laborers in those respects?

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Connecticut makes a very proper suggestion. The bill proposes to make inquiries into the sanitary condition of laborers, into their educational condition, into their social condition, and into their religious condition. Mr. Chairman, is this a limited government? Can we do anything and everything we please? What do you call religion? Where do you get the authority to inquire about the religious condition of any American citizen?

Mr. HOPKINS. Do you not do that through the Census Bureau?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not know what the Census Bureau may have obtained in that way. I have not examined as to that. I suppose they have some statement as to the numbers of the different sects. Is that what the gentleman from Pennsylvania is after—to ascertain what church a man belongs to or if to any?

Mr. EATON. The Census Bureau has already given us that.

Mr. BLOUNT. We can get such information every ten years, and when obtained it is of no industrial importance.

Sir, if there is any right on our part to make this inquiry, then we have the right to take control of the whole subject. If we have the right to be making investigations as to the number of children attending school and to inquire into their religious and social condition, then we have the right to legislate upon those subjects. I can not think that the gentleman in charge of this bill when he proposes to make inquiries of this character means that and nothing more, means a simple inquiry upon the subject.

There are some things which I think have been left to the State governments, and they may make inquiries concerning them and will do so. The distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] informs me that the State of Connecticut has already made this investigation. The State of Massachusetts has issued a most valuable document upon this subject.

Mr. EATON. And we have made laws determining the manner in which children shall be treated.

Mr. BLOUNT. As the gentleman suggests, in the State of Connecticut they have followed up this information by passing laws to regulate the manner in which children shall be treated. This is what ought to be done all over the country. The local governments have charge of this matter, and I will not by my vote suggest directly or indirectly the opposite idea.

The State of Pennsylvania, the gentleman's own State, is capable and doubtless willing to do this thing. I have no doubt that every gentleman from that State, without regard to party, is willing to do it, and they represent the political thought of Pennsylvania on that subject and are quite competent to take care of it.

I have not yet heard any good reason given for the passage of this bill. I am very sure that the agricultural interests of the country are not requiring it. I think the gentleman from Connecticut lives in a community where capital and intelligence are as thoroughly identified with the manufacturing interests of the country as in any other portion. Yet he does not think it necessary to pass this bill. He finds that all of this can be provided by the State governments. I trust, therefore, that we will permit the States to exercise their rightful functions in this matter, and not undertake to do that which we have no authority under heaven to follow up with any remedial legislation.

Even if I believed that it would not eventually represent some political thought, I do not care what it is, whether it be protection or free trade, still it would be objectionable No matter what form it shall take, or what policy it should advocate, it is to my mind most objectionable, because I believe it is a delusion, rather than any practical provision to give us information.

If I felt, however, that it would furnish fairly the information sought by gentlemen entertaining the views of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] or the contrary views such as are entertained by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] I would willingly assent to it, simply upon the idea of obtaining information and for no other purpose. While I do not think that we have any occasion for it, I would be willing out of deference to what is termed the labor sentiment of the country to give them a bureau of their own if they fancied that there would be any advantage accruing to them from it.

Again, under this bill we are probably to be treated to essays on strikes, their causes, effects, and remedies. Why do we want to pay persons for getting up essays on those subjects? We created a board of health and made an appropriation for it, and then we found that a large portion of the funds of that board were utilized to pay friends of its members for getting up essays on various diseases. So I suppose a very large proportion of this fund will be likely to be given for a similar purpose.

The press of this country, the intelligence of the country, is quite able to furnish all the information that we need upon the subject of strikes. That is no new topic. There is, therefore, not one single thing suggested by this bill which would justify us in the creation of this bureau.

Suppose you obtain your information as to the social and religious condition of the people; what else can you do? Suppose you find that the laboring classes are not compensated as they should be, will you attempt to make contracts for them? If you find that they do not go to church, will you pass laws compelling them to go? If their children are not educated as you think they ought to be, will you pass laws requiring them to attend school? Or, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] suggests, if you find that they are not well, will you pass laws providing doctors for them? Sir, we need no information on this subject, and I trust this House will not see fit to create this bureau. Mr. Chairman, I would inquire how much time I have left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will yield that time to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN].

Mr. AIKEN. I do not know that I shall consume all that time. I simply desire to give notice to the House that I have two amendments which I propose to offer to this bill. The first is to strike out all after the enacting clause to the word "commissioner," in line 11, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

The Commissioner of Agriculture, through the bureau of statistics in the Department of Agriculture, shall acquire, &c.

Then in another portion of the bill I propose to strike out all after the word "desired," in line 45, down to and including the words "per annum," in line 51, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

The Commissioner shall appoint such assistants as he may deem necessary for the successful working of this bureau, provided the total expense shall not exceed $10,000 per annum.

I suppose there are many men on this floor who would not object to expending $10,000 a year to acquire the most of the information which is proposed to be gathered by this new bureau. But, sir, I do not see that there is a necessity for the establishment of a special bureau for this purpose. I believe that we have now in existence machinery that can very economically carry into effect all that is sought by this bill. If we multiply our methods of collecting statistics we increase the certainty of making mistakes, whether those statistics be valuable or not. Why, Mr. Chairman, we have now a statistical bureau in the Agricultural Department and we have a statistical bureau attached to the Treasury Department. I have never yet seen a publication from the statistical bureau of the Treasury Department relating to labor or to agricultural statistics which did not state that the information had been gathered from the statistical bureau in the Agricultural Department. The information given by the Bureau of Statistics connected with the Treasury Department is only authentic when it relates to the importation or exportation of products. All that we want now is to gather just such information as can be gathered by the bureaus already established.

We had agricultural statistics collected through the Census Bureau, and the presumption was that they were all accurate. But when we compare the statistics compiled by the Census Office (as has been stated on this floor by one or more members of the Committee on Ways and Means) with agricultural statistics gathered through the Agricultural Department we find that there is a difference of more than a thousand million dollars per annum between the two. Which source of information is correct? Establish a third bureau, and you will in my opinion increase the divergence from correctness.

The statistical bureau of the Department of Agriculture tells us that in 1880 the agricultural products of this country amounted to a little more than $4,000,000,000. The statistics as I gather them, and as the Committee on Ways and Means have asserted them upon this floor, taken from the census returns, do not give more than half that amount. The aggregate as returned by this bureau is about $2,213,000,000. Hence I believe there is great truth in what has been said by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], that these statistics are unreliable, gathered from whatever source they may be. I think he has pointed out another truth when he remarked that one reason of the unreliable character of these statistics is the simple fact that there is a political idea developed in all the information gathered for the people of this country. It is gathered too much by partisan officials, and that is the reason it is unreliable. It is not truthful.

But while this may be the case, I think it very desirable that this Government should have annually, or at least biennially, statistical statements, so that members here who have to legislate for the benefit of the whole people may be able to look with some degree of confidence to the statistical information gathered by some of the bureaus or Departments of this Government. We have already intrusted the collection of agricultural statistics entirely to the hands of the officer who is at the head of the Department of Agriculture, and who has charge of the agricultural interests of the country. In this way information may be collected quite as accurately and at the same time more cheaply and expeditiously than if we established a new bureau. Hence I desired these few minutes to state the effect of the amendments which I propose to offer to this bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, the objections made to the pending bill by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] are manifold. He commends the departments or bureaus of labor statistics in the several States as doing a good work and furnishing valuable information; but he objects to any authority by which those statistics can be compiled and made more useful to the American Congress. He objects to the creation of the bureau proposed in the bill, because he imagines that it would have some intention to lead the political thought of the country.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not like to interrupt the gentleman——

Mr. HOPKINS. I have but little time.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that I think he will find in the Library here those very documents embracing the results of the action of the State governments.

Mr. HOPKINS. I presume they are in some library; but they are not compiled for use, and I think that the gentleman from Georgia would not care to take the trouble to make such a compilation as would render that information practically useful.

A similar reply may be made to his suggestion that the consuls send certain reports. The consuls do send some reports; but these reports and all others that the gentleman has refered to are merely fragmentary, and if they are of use at all in their present shape, aggregated and compiled statements from all these sources will be of tenfold more use.

Another objection is made which I had not anticipated. I did not expect that the ghost of "State rights" would be invoked in opposition to this bill. I supposed that after Congress had by repeated action established its power to create different bureaus for obtaining information there would be no question as to its power to create another bureau for a similar purpose. It is rather difficult in two or three minutes to discuss a grave constitutional question, but as an answer to the gentleman I refer to the precedents which Congress has established in the creation of these innumerable bureaus for the collection of information.

When the gentleman interrupted me I was about to refer to the fear he expressed that this bureau is intended to lead the political thought of Congress and the nation. He remarked, I believe, that I represented one view and my colleague on the committee another, and if I recommended the passage of this bill he would be inclined to favor it. I say this report comes here with the unanimous indorsement of the committee, and by no possible construction can this measure be perverted into an attempt to lead in any direction the thought of the country upon questions of political economy.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman, I know, would not misrepresent me.

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly not.

Mr. BLOUNT. I said that if information was to be sought by a commission representing, for instance, the idea of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Missouri, I would have no objection.

Mr. HOPKINS. Very well, then. The idea of this bill, if it should be made effective, is that the man at the head of this bureau shall be a machine to gather, without tinge of political conviction, information for the benefit of gentlemen holding the views of political economy which my friend from Georgia entertains as well as gentlemen who differ from him in that respect; to furnish information on his as well as our side of the tariff question.

I do not imagine there could be by any possibility a construction put upon any clause or line of this bill which would indicate the views of any member of the committee as to the results to be attained by the establishment of this department.

The gentleman says we inquire into their sanitary condition when we do not propose to remedy it. Congress has proposed to regulate the general health at times and established a national board of health for that purpose.

So I come to the other objections alluded to by the gentleman. He has also made criticism on the religious phase of this inquiry. That objection has been made by a number of gentlemen privately to me as liable to be opposed. The only thought of the committee and the only intention in incorporating that was not that it should have any sectarian, not that there should be any inquisitorial action in regard thereto, but as a part of the mass of common information bearing on the different phases in the life of the laboring people that might also be included just as it is included in the tables of statistics furnished by the Census Bureau. Personally I have no objection to that word being stricken out, as it meets with objection with quite a number of gentlemen on both sides of the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman ought not to confine this religious inquiry to the laborers alone. We might ourselves be bettered by such religious superintendence, perhaps.

Mr. HOPKINS. We might establish a bureau of statistics and inquiry as to the sanitary and religious condition of members of Congress, in which probably some of us would not fare so well. This investigation is not for any purpose of that kind, but for the acquisition of information in regard to the laboring interests of the country.

As I have said, the people whom I represent in this discussion are fully convinced of the immense benefit that will result from a knowledge of these various facts. They do not want and I do not want to see this bureau, if established, buried under the Bureau of Agriculture, or under the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department. Let it stand alone, because it has a distinct and separate duty to perform. It has distinct and separate functions to exercise and distinct and separate materials and information to accumulate.

At the proper time I would favor with other gentlemen the uniting of these different branches under one common department of statistics where all could be combined and consolidated. At the opening of this investigation it ought to be a department that would pursue effectively this specific purpose, being embarrassed by nothing else, being controlled by no superior officer who might have his own ideas and views to promote.

The whole efficiency of the bill will depend on the selection of the proper commissioner, who ought to be a man without bias, a man of intelligence, of judgment, and experience in this regard. In a word, as I said a while ago, a man in that position should be a sort of machine, without feeling and without desire to promote any political idea or any particular line of thought.

Now how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three minutes left.

Mr. HOPKINS. I promised to yield to several gentlemen who wished to ask permission to print, and in their name I will now ask by unanimous consent that all gentlemen who desire to print remarks on this bill have permission to do so.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will yield now whatever remains of my time to my colleague [Mr. BAYNE].

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, it has been intimated there was some question as to the power of Congress to pass this bill, but it seems to me there ought not to be any question on that subject. The power of Congress to collect money and expend it for the purpose of inquiry into and looking after the general welfare of the people of the country is undoubted. Article 1, section 8, of the Constitution determines this question, however, beyond all peradventure; and in reference to the protection of American industries as well as in provision for charitable and benevolent purposes Congress has frequently exercised this power.

There are some provisions in this bill which I think ought not to be incorporated in a bill of this character. This requires an investigation as to the religious condition of the people. That provision, if adopted, would be in direct violation of the spirit, at least, of the first amendment of the Constitution, which deprives Congress of the power to establish any religious tests or any religious institutional organizations; and the fact that Congress has undertaken or assumed the right to investigate that subject would necessarily imply to a certain extent at least the right to regulate religious institutions. I think, therefore, that provision ought to be stricken out which applies to the religious convictions of the persons whose condition it is proposed to inquire into. I think it would be a very serious objection to the bill if allowed to remain, and would give rise perhaps to sectarian controversies and issues which the politician of the period would not probably find agreeable.

I propose to offer an amendment which will reach the aspect and present condition of things, which the bill itself does not seem to reach. I propose to offer an amendment, at the end of line 37, after the word "remedies," to this effect:

And full statistics relating to the immigration and importation of laborers and their employment.

One of the questions which is now agitating to a very considerable extent the workingmen of this country, and indeed is calling forth the attention of our representatives abroad, and also our manufacturers in this country, is this very question of imported labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BAYNE. Now I move an amendment under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that two minutes yet remain in opposition to the bill.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, occupying the two minutes which yet remain, I desire simply to re-enforce as far as I may the strong argument made by the gentleman from Georgia as to the importance and necessity of amending the bill as I have already proposed. If the evils which he apprehends here should result, it would be better that these evils should be as small in proportion and as easily corrected as possible. Hence the necessity of making this a bureau instead of a department. If it should work evil, as he thinks it would, then it would be easier, very much easier, to abolish a mere bureau than a department of the Government. A department is a fixture. Once you establish it, and whatever its evils may be it is likely to remain.

I have been put in possession of information since I had the floor a few moments ago to the effect that the Commissioner of Agriculture has now under his direction and charge all the machinery to put in operation this bureau for the accomplishment of the purposes designed. I gather that information partly from the statement made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], and in addition I am informed from another source that the Commissioner of Agriculture has already the machinery at his command and perhaps all the employés that are necessary for all the purposes of the bill, to carry out its objects, to acquire the information designed to be acquired under this bureau, and that it can be accomplished much cheaper in that manner than in the way proposed by the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for general debate upon this bill under the order of the House has been exhausted. The bill is now subject to amendment. The amendments proposed by the committee will be first submitted to the House; after that the Chair will entertain other amendments. The Clerk will report the amendments proposed by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 48, strike out the words "Congress may from time to time provide' and insert in lieu of them the words "The commissioner may deem necessary for the successful working of the department: Provided, That the total expense shall not exceed $25,000 per annum."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. KASSON. On the pending amendment, which I understand has been offered by the committee, I take the opportunity to ask the attention of the chairman of the committee who supports the bill for the purpose of inquiring whether there was any special design on the part of the committee in changing the nomenclature of a division or a minor division of the Government service? Usually nothing exceeds the rank of bureau that does not embrace some large branch of the administration of the Government. I observe that the committee have used the word, in the fourth line, "department." I beg to ask if there is any objection to conforming with the practice of our legislation heretofore and only call this a bureau?

Mr. HOPKINS. None whatever, except that it would be attaching it to another bureau.

Mr. KASSON. You can leave it independent, if that is the objection, just as well if it be a bureau as a department.

Mr. HOPKINS. There is no objection, that I am aware of, excepting that.

Mr. KASSON. I think we ought to observe that distinction. Our great divisions here are called departments, and the minor ones, the subdivisions of the departments, are bureaus.

Mr. HOPKINS. There is one, the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. KASSON. That is true, but the gentleman will remember that it is a large bureau, which it is proposed to make really a department, as the gentleman is aware; and I hope that time will come soon when we shall merge several bureaus into that department in addition to what it now contains. I proposed to move the amendment which I have suggested, but desired first to make this inquiry.

Then in the eighth line—and I again call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania—the bill provides that "the commissioner of labor statistics shall hold his office for four years unless sooner removed," without the usual clause "and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified." I desire to offer an amendment to add that clause.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. KASSON. Then wherever the word "religious" occurs I suggest that the gentleman should substitute the word "moral," which I think is the proper word to use.

Mr. HOPKINS. That also will be accepted.

Mr. KASSON. I want still to keep the gentleman's attention. In the twentieth line, where the bill calls for information as to the number and ages of children, I suppose it means children employed in labor Those are the points to which I desired to call the gentleman's attention so as to save the necessity of prolonging debate on them when they are reached.

Mr. AIKEN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. AIKEN. If the amendment reported by the committee shall be adopted, would that part of the bill be open to an additional amendment when it is reached?

The CHAIRMAN. Unquestionably. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee which has just been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. KASSON. If the gentleman from Texas has something more than a mere amendment to the text of the bill, I ask that he shall allow me to offer the verbal amendments I have indicated and which, I understand, the chairman of the Committee on Labor approves.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. All right.

Mr. KASSON. I move to amend by inserting the word "bureau" instead of the word "department" wherever it occurs.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. KASSON. In line 8, if the committee were willing, I should be glad to strike out the words "for four years," in conformity with what seems to be the desire of all of us who propose civil-service reform—that is, that the term of office should be during good behavior. But if those words shall remain—and on that theory I will move my amendment—I propose to insert after the word "years," in line 8, the words "and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified."

Mr. HOPKINS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think that amendment had better be left to be voted on when it is reached.

Mr. KASSON. It is reached now.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not understand that the bill is being read by sections for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is but one section in the bill, and it is now open to amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to say just a word in reference to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa. I do not know I would object to striking out the words "for four years," but I do not want to commit myself to the policy of a life-tenure of office by agreeing to such an amendment.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman has not got my point. I did not move to strike out the words "for four years," but merely to insert the words "until his successor shall be appointed and qualified."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not object to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I move now to strike out the word "religious" where it occurs and insert the word "moral."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think my friend from Iowa should also include in his amendment the striking out of the words "and church," in line 21, where the bill provides for obtaining information as to the attendance of children at school and church.

Mr. KASSON. Let the question first be taken on my amendment as I have offered it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to strike out the word "religious" and insert the word "moral."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. Now, in line 20, after the word "children," I propose to insert the words "employed in labor."

Mr. HOPKINS. I think that is implied. I have no objection to the amendment, but I think that is fairly implied by the context.

Mr. KASSON. I presumed it was intended, but the bill does not expressly say so.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then I move——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEWART], who gave way to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that he might offer these verbal amendments, is now recognized. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 12, between the words "social" and "intellectual," insert the word "and," and strike out the words "and religious;" so that it will read:

"The commissioner shall acquire all useful information upon the subject of labor, its relations to capital, and the means of promoting the material, social, and intellectual prosperity of the laboring men and women," &c.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. My inquiry is whether the bill should not be read in order for amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is being considered in order. There is but one paragraph in the bill. The practice in Committee of the Whole is to read a bill by paragraphs for amendment. This bill has but one paragraph.

Mr. BLAND. I think we should commence at the beginning of a bill and go through it in order.

Mr. YOUNG. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. YOUNG. My inquiry is whether amendments first offered should not be first considered?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. YOUNG. I offered one half an hour ago to the first line of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment was merely read during the gentleman's remarks for information.

Mr. YOUNG. I handed it up at the time to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment was not in order at that time. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to offer his amendment. But at present the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEWART] has the floor.

Mr. VALENTINE. I make the point that the word "religious" which the gentleman from Texas proposes to strike out has already gone out of the bill.

Mr. KASSON. I will state to the gentleman from Texas, whom I asked to yield to me that I might offer some verbal amendments, that one of those amendments, which the committee has adopted was to strike out the word "religious" and insert in lieu thereof the word "moral."

Mr. HARDEMAN. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDEMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEWART] has had the floor for five or ten minutes. He was recognized by the Chair, and other gentlemen have been slipping in amendments while he was on the floor. I rise to contend for the privileges of the gentleman from Texas, who is too modest to do it for himself. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized by the Chair to speak to his amendment and will proceed.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. It seems the necessity for the amendment I proposed to offer has been obviated by the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, which I did not understand at the time.

Mr. CUTCHEON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEWART] has the floor.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I am not so anxious to occupy the floor as to be unwilling to yield to other gentlemen if they insist upon it. My object is to perfect the bill and put it in such shape that I can conscientiously vote for it. I understand that one portion of my amendment has been adopted. But while I have the floor on the other portion of the amendment—the insertion of the little word "and" [laughter], which will perfect the sentence—I believe I will keep it and submit a few remarks upon the bill.

I believe this to be a good bill, and I trust it will meet with the favorable consideration of this committee and become a law. As has been stated by the committee who have reported this bill provision has been made by the Federal Government for acquiring and supplying information in regard to agriculture, education, mining, commerce, and transportation; but notwithstanding more than 10,000,000 of our citizens, one-fifth of our entire population, are engaged in manual labor, earning their subsistence from daily wages, no means have been provided by this Government for obtaining and supplying information that will serve to protect and give greater prosperity to this numerous and worthy class of citizens.

The bill is free from the objections that obtain to many bills of this character. It does not seek to create an office and clothe its incumbent with extraordinary powers, nor does it incur any great expense upon the part of the Government. The salary of the commissioner is fixed at $4,000 per year, and no competent man can be obtained for a less sum. The commissioner can only expend $25,000 per year in obtaining the information for which the department is formed, and this is a mere bagatelle in comparison with the amount of taxable wealth annually produced by mechanical labor, and the amount is insignificant in comparison with the good it will accomplish.

We have had much legislation in behalf of capital, for the protection and advancement of what is termed "the business interests of the country," by which is meant not the interests of the workingmen of this country, but the interests of the few who own and control capital. I have no prejudice against capital. I believe it is right to encourage and protect the investments of capital. We have been doing it for years not only here but in all the State governments, and we have done but little or nothing for labor. I know the theory is that the protection of capital is the protection of labor; that, as capital must furnish employment to labor, whatever gives encouragement and protection to the one also advances the interests of the other. This is partially true, but the sad lessons taught by experience are that it is not altogether so, and that it is true only to a limited extent.

Capital is selfish, exacting, and not unfrequently oppressive. The capitalist is perfectly willing to have the laborer work for him ten and more hours out of the twenty-four for such an amount of money as will be barely sufficient to support himself and family, and yet the man of wealth sees no harm in this, but feels that he has done well in furnishing employment to the laborer at any price. He regards labor as a commodity, to be purchased at the cheapest possible price. He does not hesitate to import labor contracted for in Europe or elsewhere in order to reduce wages and to increase his own profits. The results of such action upon the part of capitalists have been strikes and their consequences, more frequently disastrous to the laboring man and those dependent upon him than to any one else.

A gentleman near me asks how I am going to help it. I answer that I want such information obtained upon the subject of labor as will enable not only this Government, where it has jurisdiction, but also the State governments to act advisedly upon this subject, and I will say to the gentleman who interrogated me that there can be no more objection to the department sought to be created by this bill than there is to the Agricultural Department; not one bit. There can be no greater objection to it than to other bureaus of statistics which have been established by this Government.

It is high time there should be some legislation in behalf of the workers of this country, in behalf of those whose brain and muscle have contributed so much to the development of this great country. If it be right to obtain and supply information to those who are engaged in commerce and the carrying business, why should we not do the same for those without whose help it would be impossible to operate railroads and to carry on commerce? This bill, if it becomes a law, will be the means of bringing capital and labor together in more friendly relations than they have been heretofore, of forming a closer alliance; for I have no doubt but what the information obtained and disseminated will bring about such investigations and cause such arrangements to be made as will cause greater harmony between capital and labor, and be of mutual advantage to these great elements in society.

This House is now wrestling with a great financial question, the tariff. Protectionists claim that a high tariff increases wages or hire of the workingmen; their slogan is protection for American industry, for American labor. Free-traders and tariff reformers deny that a high tariff is of benefit to the mechanic or laboring man. They claim that it only increases the profits of the capitalist who has his money invested in manufactures, without a corresponding increase of the wages of the operatives or employés, and that it is a positive injury to the workman because of the increased price it causes him to pay for everything that he buys for himself or family. Now, if we had had for the last ten years a bureau of labor statistics, what a flood of light it could throw upon this subject. This is one of the questions that I want investigated. I am a tariff reformer, as much so as any man on this floor, and I am so sure that truth is on my side of this question that instead of being afraid I absolutely court an investigation of it. I am willing to know the truth about it. If my party can not be sustained by the truth, then I for one say it ought not to be sustained.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that reports from Government Departments and bureaus are not entirely reliable, and especially is this so in regard to statistical information; that too frequently such reports bear the impress of the politics of the administration under which they are made; but this is an incident of humanity and there is no help for it. I suppose the same fault can be imputed to every Department of the Government. Yet, with all its imperfections, the department provided for by this bill can and will do much for the good of the toiler who in the sweat of his face must eat his bread.

If the commissioner performs the specific duties required of him by the provisions of this bill there will be obtained a vast amount of information that can be so utilized as to promote the welfare not only of the working men but of all men in this country, for I hold to the opinion that labor creates all wealth, and that any measure which gives prosperity to the laboring classes must of necessity give prosperity to all other classes.

I am as much opposed to the creation of new departments, of new bureaus, and of new offices as any one can be; and if it were possible to obtain the statistics sought to be obtained by the provisions of this bill through or by means of any of the Departments now in existence I would prefer that it should be done in that way. But I do not believe that the investigations will be so thorough and exhaustive as if made by a department charged with this special duty, and therefore I favor the passage of the bill. Census Reports, made as they are at long, stated, intervals of time, will not answer the purpose sought to be accomplished in this bill. The information is needed every year. Month after month, and day by day, if possible, should the men and women whose labor carries on the industries of these States be furnished with all information that will enable them to lighten their burdens and bring to them and their families greater prosperity and happiness.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to move an amendment; to strike out all after the words "charge of," in line 5, down to and including the word "Senate," in line 7, and——

Mr. BLOUNT. I thought the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] took the floor to debate the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEWART]; but he seems to be offering another amendment. I wish to reply to the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules five minutes' time is allowed in opposition to the proposed amendment.

Mr. BLAND. I understood the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEWART] to withdraw his amendment because the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] had moved an amendment which was adopted striking out the words which the gentleman from Texas wanted to have stricken out; hence there is no amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas has not been withdrawn, as the Chair is advised.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I am willing to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object to the withdrawal until I can reply to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can withdraw his amendment if he desires to do so.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] desires to speak upon it, I will not withdraw it for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] will be heard in opposition to it.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEWART] said he was in favor of this bill because he wanted to do something for the laboring man and wanted it done through the Federal Government. Now, what is that something which he desires to do for the laboring man? The chairman of the committee reporting this bill [Mr. HOPKINS] says that its object is the gathering of statistics.

The gentleman from Texas, when he was asked what he would do with this information when he had obtained it, said that this Government and the State governments might legislate in the light of the facts thus obtained. I would like to know, when the gentleman says that this Government can legislate on this information when obtained, what sort of legislation the gentleman proposes.

Will the gentleman attempt to regulate labor contracts? Will he undertake to legislate to prevent, in the interest of the laboring men of this country, the incoming of working people from other lands? Will he propose to legislate—not upon the religious condition, for that language seems to have been changed—but upon the moral condition of the laborer? What particular thing does he propose that this Government shall do? He has thus far failed to designate, and I presume will to the end fail to designate, anything tangible that we shall do.

The gentleman says further that he proposes to give this information to the State governments. Where is the demand from any State government for this information? Has the State of Texas asked for it?

Mr. STEWART, of Texas, rose

Mr. BLOUNT. I cannot yield except for a sentence. I have no objection of course to the gentleman replying to me when I am through.

Does such a demand come from the State of Texas? I have heard nothing of anything of that kind. In my section I have heard of no such demand. There is, I believe, no such demand from any agricultural section. How is it with the manufacturing region? The gentleman from Connecticut, representing perhaps the center of manufactures in New England—at least one of the most important portions of that manufacturing community—says they do not want this information there; that they have gathered it for themselves and have utilized it in their legislation. The State of Massachusetts has gathered more important information on these subjects than perhaps any other State in this Union. Is she clamoring for a measure of this kind? The State governments are not asking for it. The Federal Government is collecting this information already through the Bureau of Agriculture.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I move to amend by striking out the last word. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has asked me what I propose to do for the laboring man—what laws I propose to enact for his benefit? I will play the Yankee, and ask him some questions. I ask him for what purpose was the Agricultural Department of this Government instituted? Was it not established for the purpose of disseminating information, for the purpose of giving to the agricultural portion of this country such facts and statistics as would be of benefit to the large class of our citizens engaged in agriculture? That certainly was the object.

Mr. BLOUNT. And that department is now doing the very thing you want to do under this bill.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Yes; it is doing it. Not for the artisan, not for the mechanic, but purely for the people who are engaged in agriculture.

Mr. BLOUNT. It is doing the work for the artisan and the mechanic; it is gathering information in regard to all the industrial and manufacturing interests of the country.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. If it is doing so, that is no just reply to the argument I am making. I say there is a large mechanical interest, a large laboring interest, in this country that has no connection with agriculture at all; and this Government has never provided in my judgment sufficient means for giving to these classes the information which would improve their condition and enable them to place themselves in a better position than they are to-day.

The gentleman asks me if there has been any demand from the State of Texas for a measure of this kind. I answer yes; I have received numerous letters from mechanics and artisans of my State who are asking that Congress shall consider their claims and that statistics with reference to their interests may be obtained. They represent that their wages are being reduced daily. While the rich are growing richer, the poor are becoming poorer.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman propose to stop that?

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. If I can; I would.

Mr. BLOUNT. Ah!

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I answer the gentleman flatly, I will do what I can by furnishing such information as will benefit not only the mechanic and the laborer but also the capitalist; for I believe that when these investigations are properly made they will do much not only to benefit all classes of laboring people, but will tend to introduce more harmonious relations between capital and labor than have heretofore existed.

You have a Bureau of Education; for what purpose? Do you propose to enact laws that shall control the system of education in the States? Do you propose to make laws that shall enforce education in the different States of this Union? I take it you have no such purpose. Your object is to afford information upon that subject to the people of all the States, so that they may all receive benefit from it. It is with a similar purpose that I advocate this bill, which I contend is in the interest of large classes of our citizens.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. For the purpose of replying to remarks which have been made in opposition to the bill I renew the amendment.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a point of order. If it be in order I desire to offer an amendment. I understood that the gentleman from Texas withdrew his amendment, and then renewed it that the gentleman from Georgia might make a speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send his amendment to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in lines 5, 6, and 7, the words "a commissioner of labor statistics, who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate" and insert "the president of the Knights of Labor."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, the object of the amendment is that the bureau, whatever it may be, shall have a laboring man at the head of it. My experience here is that for the number of the friends of labor and the poor man in this House there is less done for either than for almost any other class of our people. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, the difficulty with the bill is that unless this amendment prevails capital will dictate the appointment of this commissioner. We had experience in that regard in the appointment of the members of the celebrated Tariff Commission. The laboring men had no representative on that commission. The farmer had no representative on it.

Mr. MCADOO. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BLAND. Not now. There was but one interest subserved by that Tariff Commission; the members of that commission were appointed to serve but one interest, and that the interest of capital invested in protected industries. Unless there is some limitation on the appointing power, if this bill should pass these very industries of which labor complains, the very power to-day that has its hand to crush labor is the power that will dictate the appointment of the commissioner at the head of the bureau to investigate the condition of the laborer himself. I think instead of the bill being in favor of the laboring man and protecting by its terms the interests of labor, it will simply enable capital further to dominate and oppress labor.

These labor organizations throughout the country have a representative man, and I want to see a vote on this bill as to who is the friend of these labor organizations and the laboring men of the country, and who in favor of capital will dictate the appointment of this commissioner. That representative man is the president of the Knights of Labor. If you wish to serve the interest of labor and the laboring man by the terms of this bill then let this bureau be placed under the superintendence of the Knights of Labor, so as to let the laboring men have a representative upon it. Unless you vote for that amendment the bill will show evidently what it is intended for. Unless this House does adopt that, the country will know the protected interest in this House is sufficient to organize this bureau in behalf of capitalists. The vote will show whether this is to be in the interest of labor or in favor of the protected industries of which the laboring men complain.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WELLER. I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BAYNE. I also wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. To this or another part of the bill?

Mr. BAYNE. To another part of the bill.

Mr. WELLER. Mine is a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania after this is disposed of.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, I move as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] the following, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after the word "Senate," in the seventh line, the following: "Provided, however, To be selected from a list of names presented by the legislative committee of the Federation of Labor;" so that it will read as so amended: "Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be established and maintained at the seat of Government a department of labor statistics, which shall be under the charge of a commissioner of labor statistics, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided, however, To be selected from a list of names presented by the legislative committee of the Federation of Labor."

Mr. WELLER. The substitute I offer is intended to accomplish the same general purpose as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND]. One of the great troubles that labor has had to contend with has been the want of reliable and pertinent statistics by which to show the causes that have led to the disastrous condition of labor being placed under the heel of aggregated money capital in the hands of monopolies. I wish to say that labor will never get a redress of its great and just grievances either at the hands of this Congress or any other unless they are permitted and properly assisted to get possession of all the facts by statistics that will be of advantage to labor to show the real causes that produce the conditions of which they so justly complain.

Statistics in abundance have already been obtained on many matters of importance to labor, but too often they have been obtained by those who have had an interest in the suppression of vital facts, facts positively essential to a correct understanding and solution of the labor problem. The interest of those engaged in the taking of such statistics or of those employing such statisticians has been inimical to the true welfare of labor, and in my honest judgment has sought to hide from the masses the real causes that have and do lead to a depression of labor and placing it under the iron heel of aggregated capital, and by reason of such lack of information hold labor in the bondage of its power. This amendment seeks to place at the head of such bureau a man chosen by the legislative committee of the Federation of Labor Unions and Knights of Labor of the District of Columbia—a man of acknowledged ability, who will satisfy the labor element of the country, one in whom they have confidence.

I believe, sir, that I can better attend to business in which I have a specific and well-defined interest myself than to have attention paid to that interest by some person who may be opposed to it, and whose views would be inimical in all particulars and policies with reference to its ultimate success.

There can be no reason in the world why this bureau—thus being amended by my colleague [Mr. KASSON] instead of department—this bureau should not be presided over by a person selected by the very men who are demanding at the hands of this Congress measures to assist in a redress of the grievances of which they now complain and have been complaining for, lo! these many years, without a single, solitary beneficial result except such as has come from organization and agitation. It is about time, indeed it is high time, that they were heard.

Why, sir, they tell us here that overproduction is the great and increasing evil of the day in which we now live; and yet, Mr. Chairman, I presented to the House the other day for its consideration a series of resolutions, certified to by high authority, that the Government employés have been forced ofttimes in defiance of existing law to labor by direction of their superior officials ten hours a day but only granted pay for eight hours. Now, if overproduction is the real trouble and is the true and only cause of the evils complained of, why do they force men to work beyond the limits of the law, thus increasing overproduction while refusing to pay for overwork?

I want to say as a matter of fact that overproduction in the great aggregate of the products of labor in this country never really and truly existed. The statement is an error on the facts. That which is denominated overproduction is simply underconsumption. That is all there is of it. Talk of overproduction in this country when thousands upon thousands are going without food, while begging for leave to toil to earn their bread; who go without proper clothing, without homes, without proper shelter, without the thousand and one things that would adorn and beautify that home and help to make of it a haven of rest to the weary and toil-worn limbs of labor, now shackled to the gilded Juggernaut of purse-proud aristocracies—to the monopolies that grind labor to conditions where life is but a hell of hopes crushed and withered, prospects blighted, ending in certain pauperism, then indifference to good order and law, thence to conditions that breed crime, suicide, and insanity, as surely as cause in operation produces and results in effect.

It is worse than folly. It is a crime against humanity to talk of overproduction as the cause of starvation prices to ill-fed, ill-clad, and worse-sheltered toiling men, women, and children. It is a stultification of the boasted Christian civilization of this the nineteenth century, as well as against the intelligence of the common people, to proclaim, as has been done on this floor, that hard times and consequent poverty come as the result of overproduction. The panic of 1873 to 1879 was due to causes that the laboring masses failed to comprehend; that the aristocratic and monopolistic classes desired they might never comprehend, for the reason that if labor should once know the real and true causes and with it know the proper and only true remedy, and then find out that they had a clear constitutional right to apply the true remedy, and should once as a great body taste and know and fully realize the blessed fruits of the true, great, and only remedy in operation as a national policy, they, the industrial classes, would not be slow to strike off the shackle that binds now the limbs of labor to the rack of oppression and want that unchristian, inhuman, voracious greed of corporate monopolies has lashed them and now holds them to.

I am clearly of the opinion that there are three questions of supreme paramount importance that ought to engage the attention of this Congress, and receive such exhaustive discussion and analysis as the history and experiences of the past, coupled with the wisdom of demonstrations in the present, make possible. The three questions to which I allude are—and I name them in the order of their importance as I comprehend: First, finance in all its phases, constitutional, practical, and otherwise; second, tariff; third, taxation.

In my judgment, if these three questions were wisely and patriotically settled according to the genius of our peculiar form of Government and the letter and spirit of the Declaration of Independence and our United States Constitution, labor would no longer complain of the outrageous wrongs perpetrated daily against it, which has led, is leading, and will continue in a greater degree than ever before to lead to strikes, riots, incendiarism, suicides, insanity, murder, burglary, robbery, and every other crime known to the catalogue of outrages and horrors, accounts of which to-day blacken the pages of our country and metropolitan daily and weekly sheets of news.

I want to repeat, there never will be a redress of the grievances of which labor so justly and properly complains unless the financial questions of this country be first thoroughly understood in all phases of applications and influences on the business and labor interests of our producing and distributing classes, and, when so understood, wisely, humanely, and patriotically applied.

We have a Government, sir, that is peculiar in its form and character. The genius of it, as given to us by the fathers, was a government of, by, and for the people; not as now, a government of corporations, by money, capital, for the consolidated and consolidating monopolies. This Government differs from every other government on the face of the earth. Our Constitution is national and not international. Our laws are either national, State, or municipal, and not international.

Our judiciary is either national, State, or local in its jurisdiction of authority, and the question has frequently come to my mind, why not have a money as purely national and peculiar as our United States Constitution is national and as such distinctively peculiar? There have been strangely determined efforts in the last few years, made by prominent men, to fasten on this Government a financial system as peculiar, diverse from, and in opposition to, the spirit and genius of our form of Government, and as inimical to our entire governmental theory as possibly could be made.

Now, to the end that labor may be honestly, properly, and wisely informed by efforts of a corps of statisticians, under a bureau to establish and maintain a proper, honest, and correct system, to collect and collate statistical information, I have deemed it only proper and just to labor and its demands that we, the servants of the people, we, the supreme law-making body in this land, should give direction to the wishes of these supplicants, and insist in this act by our votes that the President of these United States should only nominate and appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, such man to be chief of this bureau as would have an interest to present to the country and the world the real and true causes in operation that to-day are depressing labor and the industries of the country.

I as a laboring man, as an open and avowed friend to labor and its best interests and to the lifting up of producing classes to that condition of proper independence that labor ought to speedily attain to and when once it reaches that proper condition to remain in, have offered this amendment in good faith, hoping even though the wisdom of this House in consideration of possible constitutional questions involved may nevertheless give such an expression thereon as will make it appear to the Executive of this nation, should this bill become a law, that he is in duty bound to so respect the labor element as not to ignore their just demands by placing at the head of this bureau any one not thoroughly, intelligently, honestly identified with the interests that it is intended by this bill to serve and which ought to be served by such an appointment. I here close with this proposition:

Labor creates all the wealth there is or ever was, except that which the "great First Cause," "least understood," grants to humanity and scatters with lavish hand on every side to bless humanity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I move that the time of the gentleman be extended.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If I may be recognized, I desire to surrender my time to the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes have expired in support of the amendment.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rise to oppose the amendment, but will let the gentleman make my speech.

Mr. WELLER. I thank the gentleman from Indiana very much indeed. [Laughter.] It was unexpected. I already have unanimous consent to print extended remarks.

Mr. BAYNE. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAYNE. I wish to ask if the Chair will hold that it is in order for the entire time for and against this amendment to be used in favor of it by the gentleman from Iowa?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hold that the gentleman can only proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAYNE. Then I shall feel compelled to object. There will be other opportunities when the gentleman can be heard.

I ask now a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is properly a substitute, as he suggested, for the pending amendment.

Mr. WELLER. Then, if not a substitute, I offer it as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. AIKEN. Then, if in order, I will offer a substitute for both.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition of the gentleman from Iowa will be in order after the committee have acted upon the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri. But the proposition which he has submitted is merely one to perfect the existing text of the bill, and is not, as the Chair thinks, in any way connected with the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WELLER. I trust the chairman will permit me to suggest that it aims at the very matter sought to be accomplished by the gentleman from Missouri in his amendment, but in a different and as I think better way. It seeks to put at the head of this bureau one of the selections made by those men most interested in the question. That was the very point aimed at by the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri. Now, I seek to put at the head of the bureau a member of the labor organization of the country. That, also, I understand to be the object of his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the proposition to the committee as an amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WELLER. I shall be satisfied to have it put in that form.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. HART. Let the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa be read in connection with that proposed by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Let us have the whole business together.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments have been once read. If there be no objection they will be read again.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. WELLER. I make the point of order that the gentleman is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending amendments again.

The amendments of Mr. BLAND and Mr. WELLER were again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] is recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. VALENTINE. I desire to make the point of order on that amendment that it is a violation of the Constitution in so far as it restricts the appointing power of the President.

Mr. BLAND. That is not a point of order.

Mr. VALENTINE. I do not insist on the point of order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If I understand the proposition before the House it is to have the Knights of Labor select the man who is to occupy the position of commissioner of labor statistics.

Mr. WELLER. I desire at the outset to correct the gentleman's impression. It is that he shall be selected by the legislative committee of the Federation of Labor, acting with the Knights of Labor, which takes in trades-unions and all the labor organizations, as I understand, or nearly all the labor organizations of the United States.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I am glad the gentleman explains, because his explanation goes further than I thought. If the gentleman really is in favor of this bill, and as I understand he is a party swinging by himself in space——

Mr. WELLER. I desire again to correct the gentleman. [Laughter]. I am not a party by myself swinging in space, but am in hearty accord with the labor element of the country.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I was about to say the gentleman is swinging at the tail of the kite of the labor element.

Mr. WELLER. I rise to correct the gentleman again. I am part and parcel of the kite itself. [Laughter and applause.] I am an integral part of the body, in hearty accord with its purposes and expect its success.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I hope I shall not be interrupted. My time is limited.

Mr. WELLER. And I am clearly of opinion that the gentleman from Kentucky is not even a thread in the string that holds the labor element to the interest of the people. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I do not yield for this to come out of my time. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I desire to invite the attention of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri——

Mr. WELLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. I have been informed by my friends surrounding me that the gentleman from Kentucky has yielded his time to me; I would like to know if that is true. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yielded in courtesy to the gentleman from Iowa to ask a question, of course, but not to take me off the floor.

In all seriousness I desire to say to the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], if he is in earnes tabout desiring to get some statistics for the benefit of the laboring men, that to put in this bill that any particular man shall be at the head of this commission is so directly contrary to the Constitution of the United States that he must see the only effect of such an amendment will be to kill the bill.

Mr. BLAND. We have the power to limit and designate.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. You have no such power.

Mr. BLAND. And the bill is killed without that?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Is not that the purpose of the gentleman—to kill the bill?

Mr. BLAND. My purpose is to make the bill effective by putting a laboring man at the head of it, and not a monopolist.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Now, the question about what is a monopolist depends on the side of the question on which a man stands. Under the Constitution of the United States the President of the United States is to appoint every officer from embassadors down, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Now, the gentleman from Missouri proposes to put in this bill that this House shall deprive the President of a part of his appointing power. I say you kill the bill by any such proposition.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky this question——

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] goes further, and proposes to have the selection made by all these societies, as to which he says he is a part of the body, or that he is the head or the tail of this party, swinging in space.

Mr. WELLER. I am a part of the great heart of the labor element of the country and am fighting for their interests.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman does not look as if he ever labored in his life. He may belong to the Labor party, but——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

The question being taken; there were—ayes 93, noes 34.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1340) to establish and maintain a department of labor statistics, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming consideration of the bill (H. R. 1340), and pending that motion I move that all debate on the bill and amendments thereto be limited to twenty minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Pending that, he moves that all debate on the section under consideration and amendments thereto be limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. BLAND. There is but one section to the bill, and that motion cuts off in twenty minutes all debate on the bill. I move to amend by making the time one hour.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] to allow me to offer an amendment of which I gave notice when the bill was being considered. I am informed the entire bill has been read and gentlemen have been allowed to offer amendments to various lines of the bill. I want to have mine considered.

The SPEAKER. If the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania should be adopted it does not have the effect of cutting off amendments, but stops debate at the end of the time fixed.

Mr. CALKINS. I understand the motion is to limit debate on the pending amendments.

The SPEAKER. On the pending section and amendments.

Mr. CALKINS. On amendments now pending; but if other amendments shall be offered the usual debate will be allowed on them.

The SPEAKER. Not when the House closes debate on a section, which may be done under the rule.

Mr. CALKINS. The rule is the House may limit debate on all pending amendments or it may close debate on all amendments; but I did not understand the gentleman proposed that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman is mistaken concerning such a rule. As soon as the rule upon the subject can be found the Chair will direct that it be read. The motion permitted by the rule is to limit debate upon the pending amendments and upon the paragraph or section; not upon all amendments. The effect of that is to prevent debate upon any amendment to the section after the time so fixed has expired, but not to cut off the offering of amendments.

Mr. CALKINS. The point made was that the motion of the gentleman did not go that far. If his motion is as comprehensive as the Speaker states it, it will cut off all debate upon all amendments at the end of the time named. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to cut off all discussion on future amendments?

Mr. HOPKINS. Cut off all discussion on all amendments after the expiration of twenty minutes. The danger is that the bill is being talked to death.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

The House may, by the vote of a majority of the members present, at any time after the five minutes' debate has begun upon proposed amendments to any section or paragraph to a bill, close all debate upon such section or paragraph, or, at its election, upon the pending amendments only; but this shall not preclude further amendment, to be decided without debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] moves to amend the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] so as to allow debate for one hour. The question is first on that amendment.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 48, noes 66.

Mr. BLAND. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOPKINS and Mr. BLAND were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 44, noes 121.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The motion to limit debate to twenty minutes was then agreed to.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. WELLBORN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole, and will resume the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1340) to establish and maintain a department of labor statistics. By order of the House all debate upon the pending section, which is the bill and amendments, will be limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. Will it be proper for me at this time to withdraw my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is competent for the gentleman to do so.

Mr. WELLER. I will withdraw my amendment, lest it harm the bill, which I do not desire to do.

Mr. HOPKINS. I hope the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] will be actuated by the same motives and pursue the same course.

Mr. BLAND. I would inquire of the Chair how the time allowed for debate is to be divided?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] in charge of the bill to control ten minutes of the time for debate and the remaining ten minutes will be assigned by the Chair to some gentleman opposed to the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield three minutes of my time to my colleague [Mr. BAYNE].

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BELFORD. There is but one section in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill. I wish to inquire if I am cut off from doing so?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] that the effect of the limitation upon debate will not be to preclude the offering of amendments.

Mr. BAYNE. In consequence of the fact that House bill No. 2550 was reported from the same committee, being a bill to prohibit the immigration and importation of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labor, the committee in preparing this bill, perhaps from an oversight, put in no provision relating to that subject. I therefore propose to ask the committee to accept an amendment to the pending bill which will include in its operation the collecting of information concerning the immigration and importation of laborers and their employment in this country, my purpose being to have embodied in the report of this bureau of statistics information upon that subject, it being of a like nature to most of the matters embraced within the jurisdiction and control of the bureau to be created by this bill.

Mr. HORR. I do not think anybody will object to that.

Mr. BAYNE. Since Congress so wisely prohibited the immigration of Chinese, the greatest difficulty that now seems to exist in the labor fields of this country is such as arises from the importation of contract labor. There are difficulties now in the State of Pennsylvania growing out of that.

It must be said for most of the manufacturers and business men in this country that they are utterly hostile to any scheme looking to the importation of contract labor. But while that is true of the great mass of the manufacturers and producers, there are some among them who are willing to adopt such means for the purpose of carrying on their business and perhaps competing with their more fortunate rivals in the markets of the country.

I for one believe in the great system of protecting American industries, and I will never hold out a false hope to the laborers of my country. If it were not for my belief in the idea that the protective tariff affords protection to the labor of the country, I should not favor a protective tariff, because I believe that the capital of this country, which has been fostered and accumulated by protection, is now able to compete with the capital of any nation of the world. I believe that the protective policy inures to the benefit of labor. I realize the fact that unless the American nation keeps its laborers upon a high plane, enables them to educate their children and to live in comfortable homes, the end of free institutions in this country is near and the day of national decay has begun. But while labor is so protected that the laborers can live in comfortable houses, can educate their children and can enjoy many of the luxuries of life, so long will free institutions continue; so long shall we be a happy and prosperous people—a great and growing nation in everything that constitutes true civilization. In this view I consider the amendment which I propose to offer a most important addition to the bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. YOUNG. I make the point that the amendment suggested by the gentleman is the substance of another bill pending before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. When the amendment is submitted to the Committee of the Whole the Chair will determine the point of order. Five minutes still remain of the time belonging to the advocates of the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. I only yielded three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman yielded five minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS. I had promised portions of my time to other gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can only extend recognition for five minutes longer to gentlemen favoring the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire merely to indicate one or two amendments which at the proper time I shall offer to this bill. One is to strike out "$4,000" and insert "$3,000" as the salary of this commissioner of labor statistics. Three thousand dollars is now the salary of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics; and I think there ought to be no difference in the salaries of the two offices.

There is one other amendment I wish to offer. In line 12 the word "religious" has been struck out and the word "moral" substituted. We should also strike out in line 21 the words "and church," and in lines 30 and 31 the words "and churches," so that the bill may not conflict with article 1 of the amendments of the Constitution. To these amendments the chairman of the committee [Mr. HOPKINS] I believe assents.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman rise to oppose the bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman is recognized to control the time in opposition.

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield one minute to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN].

Mr. AIKEN. I desire only to call attention again to the amendment I have already indicated, and which, if it be in order, I will now offer as a substitute for the pending amendment. I ask that my amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause down to and including the word "Commissioner," in the tenth line of the bill, and insert "the Commissioner of Agriculture, through the bureau of statistics in the Department of Agriculture, shall acquire," &c.

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, the object of the amendment which I have offered is to put at the head of this bureau some man who shall represent the labor interest itself. It is claimed that it would be unconstitutional to direct in this way whom the President should appoint.

Sir, there are many unconstitutional features in the bill. The question is whether the whole bill is not unconstitutional? But certainly we have power to direct from what class this commissioner shall come; and it is useless to establish a bureau for the benefit of labor unless Congress exercises some supervision over the appointing power. This is shown by our experience in the past with reference to appointments of this kind. For the last few years the laboring people, many of whom are now out of employment all over this country, have been used by these manufacturing establishments in order to make profits; but today, because their profits are not so great, owing to the want of a market and to overproduction, these men are thrown out of employment and are left to starve or to depend upon charity for support. We have every reason to believe that unless we provide to the contrary these manufacturing monopolies will dictate the appointment of the commissioner, and that his policy will be to aid in further depressing labor instead of protecting it. Now, I claim that we ought to have at the head of this bureau a laboring man.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLOUNT. How many minutes have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. There are eight minutes remaining.

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER].

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Chairman, no gentleman, I think, who has spoken in favor of this bill pretends to believe that the Government of the United States can accomplish anything in reference to the subject-matters on which we are authorizing inquiry to be made. There is not a single matter as to which this bill seeks to make inquiry and to obtain information which does not belong clearly, indubitably, and specifically to the State governments. What are the subjects upon which information is to be obtained? Insanity, crime, education, hours of labor, the treatment of laborers. About all these and numberless other topics we are to undertake to get information. We are to get information. How do you propose to get it? You appropriate $25,000. That will not begin to gather the necessary reliable information on this question.

Just look at it for a moment, Mr. Chairman. It covers the whole field so far as the State government is concerned. It involves the moral and social condition of the people and their labor in every possible form. It is not confined to the factories of Pittsburgh or anywhere else, but it is extended to labor engaged in agriculture, as well as in every other department of human industry.

Unless there is some tribunal or bureau to collect this information it is said it will be useless to attempt to do anything with it. How is it to be obtained? You can not get it except by sending out agents as you do in taking the census. All the information which you get you will have to take second handed unless you collect it through your own agents, and second-handed information is not the proper basis for any proper legislation by this House.

But, sir, when this information is procured it is not pretended we shall legislate upon it. There is no pretense you are going to legislate at all. And I ask this House if it does not see enough on the Calendar of the business of this House to show it that we have gone far enough in considering matters outside of the original design of the Government. Have we not already interfered too much with matters not properly belonging to us? Have we not thereby crowded our Calendars, and in effect prevented any action on that which is of the utmost importance and in reference to which the people have been knocking at the doors of Congress for years? In my judgment we should cease attending to things which are neither necessary nor proper for us to consider, and we should confine ourselves to those things which are legitimate, necessary, and over which we have jurisdiction. As it is now, we are all the time occupied in doing that which goes for nothing and neglecting that which belongs to us. We postpone everything over which we have exclusive power in order to take up matters over which we really have no control.

Every man knows when we get this information, insufficient and unreliable as it must be, it looks to the exercise of power now under State jurisdiction. Is that right? Many of the States are already taking care of this matter for themselves.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss this question, but will ask to have read an extract from an old letter which reads very well.

The Clerk read as follows:

The whole progress of society consists in learning how to attain by the independent action or voluntary association of individuals those objects which are at first attempted only through the agency of government, and in lessening the sphere of legislation and enlarging that of the individual reason and conscience. Our American institutions have recognized this idea more completely than any other, and the Democratic party has generally been the faithful guardian of its progressive development. In most of the great practical questions of our time it has opposed the interference of government even for the best objects, and because it was solicitous for those objects, has preferred to trust them to wiser, safer, and more efficient agencies. Devoted to the rights of our American industry, which is now beginning to fill the world with the renown of its achievements, it has refused to direct its application by prohibitory or protective tariffs, preferring that each man should judge how he can make his own labor most productive, and trusting for the aggregate result to those natural laws which enable every one of our million of city population to daily choose his food, and yet furnish buyers for everything that has been provided beforehand. Claiming a good currency for the people and well regulated exchanges, it has discarded a national bank, and seeks to put these great interests under the guardianship of the laws of trade.

Friendly to the modern machinery of travel and transport, which, by cheapening the interchange of products of different soils and climates, has in effect added fertility to the one and geniality to the other, it has opposed internal improvements by the General Government, and prohibited loans of State credit and money in aid of railroads. Asserting the freedom of voluntary association, it has refused special charters and established general laws of incorporation. On all these questions which have largely occupied the public attention for a generation, because the Democratic party has favored the ends, it has rejected the means by which large parties and many good men have erroneously sought to promote them. To-day, while it is in favor of sobriety and good morals, it disowns a system of coercive legislation which can not produce them, but must create many serious evils; which violates constitutional guarantees and sound principles of legislation; invades the rightful domain of individual judgment and conscience, and takes a step backward toward that barbarian age when the wages of labor, the price of commodities, a man's food and clothing, were dictated to him by a government calling itself paternal. I need not add that in this conclusion, as well as in the general course of the Democratic party on these former occasions, I entirely concur.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Who is it signed by? Let the Clerk read the name.

The CLERK. Samuel J. Tilden. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time in opposition to the bill has expired.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I rise to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I move, in line 23, after the word "employed," to insert the following words: "and the effect of shortening the hours of labor upon production."

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order now, as there is an amendment already pending.

Mr. CUTCHEON. If I may be allowed, I will make the remarks now I desire to submit and will offer the amendment at the proper time.

One of the great and growing questions connected with the subject of labor at the present time is the effect of shortening the hours of labor upon production. Some maintain that by shortening the period of labor to eight hours a day as great production will result in the long run as by continuing the present long day of ten hours. I desire that the commissioner shall inquire into this subject and forward his conclusions to Congress in connection with the other subjects committed to him.

In one word now I desire to say that I am in favor of this bill; I believe it is in the right direction, and I hope it will be passed by the unanimous vote of both sides of the House.

Mr. HOPKINS. I now yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. KING].

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this measure is to give ultimately to the laboring people of this country that protection which all labor needs against capital and which is afforded in no other country in the world, and as a matter of fact not even in this in the present condition of affairs. There is a feeling among the laboring classes of the United States, especially in the more thickly populated communities, that Congress legislates for everything else but the benefit of the laboring people. However erroneous this belief is, and it is in a very large degree entirely wrong, it nevertheless exists. This fact was clearly indicated in the investigations made by the Senate Committee on Education and Labor last summer. It will be a dangerous thing if this impression grows into the magnitude of a conviction in the minds of these toilers. The sense of injustice which it will create will, it is to be apprehended, exhibit itself ultimately in an explosion similar but far more potential than that which recently occurred at Cincinnati. We should therefore strive in every manner possible to open the way for a hearing of the voices of the laborers of this land, both the laboring men and women of this country.

The object of this measure is a very simple one. Gentlemen may say that these statistics are being collected now by the States. That may be true; I doubt not that it is. But the separate action of the various States is not collected or brought into one body, as would the report of the department as contemplated by this bill. Its function would be to get all of the information upon all of these subjects and place it in such form as to make it readily accessible and valuable for students of political economy. With such information at hand a conclusion could be reached which would possibly go a long way to ameliorate the condition of our fellow-beings, and, further, one to prevent these convulsions in the State which should be always guarded against.

I therefore ask that a letter on this subject from Mr. Nimmo, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, be read as a part of my remarks, as it will tend to disprove the statement of the gentleman from Georgia that that bureau already covers the ground contemplated by this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., April 12, 1884.

I am not surprised that you should be disappointed at finding that the Government of the United States does not supply statistical or other exact information in regard to the wages, hours of employment, and generally as to the condition of the laboring men and women of the country. This has been a cause of wonderment to me as it is now to you. From the time of the organization of the Government the country, and especially Congress, has needed statistical and other exact information in regard to the laboring classes for the intelligent discussion of questions of public interest, especially the never-ending tariff question. Congress has established offices of information in regard to agriculture, mining, education, commerce, immigration, and transportation, but not in regard to the vitally important subject of labor. There are now before Congress several bills for the creation of such an office, but I am unable to express any opinion as to the probability of the passage of any one of those bills. This so-called Bureau of Statistics, notwithstanding its vague and very comprehensive name, is merely a bureau of commerce, embracing transportation, immigration, and duties on imports.

I have unofficially and also officially, as opportunity has been afforded, urged the importance of a bureau or department of industry, which, among other things, should be charged with the duty of collecting and publishing just such statistical and other information as that which you seek in regard to the condition of the working women of the country. This is a great and complex work, and it must be done, if done at all, by properly trained men and women, both as experts and in a clerical capacity. It would take two or three years to get such an office into good working order. I believe that such a bureau or department, if properly organized and conducted, would be of greater practical use than any of the bureaus or offices of information now in existence under the National Government, among which offices I include the bureau of which I have charge.

In all discussions concerning the powers of the National Government there has never, I think, been any question raised with respect to the power and duty of Congress under the Constitution to supply information in regard to the material interests of the people. That appears to be an undoubted function of the General Government. Lord Bacon has said "knowledge is power," and certainly there is no knowledge so powerful as that acquired through the lessons of experience. In this light an office charged with the duty of furnishing information in regard to wages, hours of labor, and other matters of importance relative to the condition of the laboring men and women of the country may be regarded as an arm raised by the Government for the protection and advancement of their interests. Such information is, in fact, the first requisite of governmental action, protective and defensive in its nature, toward that class. The permanency of our form of government depends mainly upon the intelligence of the laboring classes, and an essential condition to their intelligence is their ability to live comfortable lives. It is an easy matter for those who employ labor to obtain information useful in the advancement of their own interests. Every commercial paper in the country which publishes prices supplies instant and exact information upon which they may base their calculations. But such is not the case with respect to the employed. Unless governments collect the needed information touching the interests of labor it will not be collected at all, and the laboring classes will be denied the very groundwork of an intelligent discussion of their rights and interests. But the Government ought, I think, to collect and publish statistical and other exact information in regard to the whole subject of industry, as well as of the employment of labor, information of various kinds tending to show clearly the true relations of capital and labor. In other words, it ought to establish a bureau or department having for its object the collection of information which would tend to secure justice as between the employer and the employed. In this view I have the concurrence of a very thoughtful man who has been at the head of one of the great labor organizations of the country.

Wishing you success in your movement, I am, very respectfully, yours,
JOSEPH NIMMO.

Mr. HOPKINS. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the passage of this bill because I believe it to be a step in the right direction. This bill authorizes the commissioner of labor statistics to acquire all useful information upon the subject of labor, its relations to capital, and the means of promoting the material, social, intellectual, and moral prosperity of the laboring men and women of this country. If we are to legislate for the greatest number, then this bill or something similar to it should be passed. Of a total population in the United States in 1880 of 36,761,607 over 10 years of age 17,392,099 were engaged in the various professional and industrial occupations, 2,647,157 being females. These were distributed as follows:

	Male.	Female.	Total.
Agriculture	7,075,983	504,510	7,670,493
Professional and personal services	2,712,943	1,361,295	4,074,238
Trade and transportation	1,750,892	59,364	1,810,256
Manufacturing, mechanical, and mining industries	3,205,124	631,988	3,837,112

Of those engaged in agriculture, 3,323,876 were returned as agricultural laborers. Of the "personal and professional" class, 1,859,223 were laborers, and 1,075,659 domestic servants. Of those engaged in "trade and transportation," 1,530,256 were laborers. This gives us a total of 11,626,156 persons in 1880 who labored for day's wages and who are directly interested in this bill. In view of these facts, Mr. Chairman, I submit that the bill under discussion, which proposes to gather information to "promote the material, social, intellectual, and moral prosperity" of so large a body of our adult population, should receive our consideration, and I confess that I am astonished that some prominent gentlemen on the opposite side of this Chamber manifest a disposition to defeat the measure.

Sir, I regret that the bill does not go further than it does, but I trust that the information acquired under its provisions will lead to legislation that will prohibit the introduction into this country of indigent labor under the contract system. I am in favor of opening our ports for the introduction of emigrants who seek our land as a home. In common with our native and foreign born citizens I extend a hearty welcome to all such. But, sir, it is well known that capitalists in their individual partnership or corporate capacity have been and are now engaged actively in various directions in contracting for labor, in the gross, from among the most indigent and degraded foreign multitudes of Europe and Asia, at minimum rates of wages, which must come in competition with our home labor and reduce in price or supplant it entirely.

What has already taken place in the recent past is amply sufficient to fill our minds with apprehension as to our future condition and demand at our hands timely self-protection. Against this policy the people whom I have the honor to represent on this floor have protested to this Congress by petition, and I desire to emphasize their protest by my voice and vote. Already there is indigence in our land because the laboring classes are not sufficiently paid. I regret, sir, that the products of labor are so cheap as they are. This country will never be truly prosperous while the common, unskilled laborer works ten hours for $1.25 or less. As remarked by another gentleman in this discussion, I am in favor of a protective tariff because I believe it enhances the price of labor, and the moment it ceases to accomplish this end that moment I shall cease to advocate a protective policy. Because the contract system debases and depreciates American labor I shall oppose it. Sir, I insist that the time has arrived when a law should be passed and rigidly enforced against all contracts for foreign pauper labor and prohibiting the introduction of the same into this country.

Trusting that this bill will, in addition to accomplishing great good in other directions, lead up to this consummation, I urge its passage.

For one hundred years this country has been the goal of the poor and struggling. Once they landed on our shores their condition improved, and of the millions that have swelled our population as immigrants few have returned to their homes across the sea. To-day our country is the most prosperous on the globe. No other country presents such inducements to the skilled artisan, the common laborer or the tiller of the soil. In no other country is labor so honored or man so highly prized. Let us maintain this condition of affairs, and the years that are to come will be more prosperous than those that have passed, and we shall leave to those who succeed us a better heritage than we entered on.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOPKINS. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR].

The CHAIRMAN. But one minute remains of the time allowed for general debate.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, after a careful reading of this bill I am satisfied that it is a move in the direction of public necessity. I know that of the things required here a large number of them are subjects upon which I have made careful inquiry, but have so far been unable to gain any accurate information from any of the Departments of the Government. The statistics will be of great value, and I do hope the House will not defeat the bill by encumbering it with amendments that will ruin it and defeat its objects. If I did not know the universal habit of the gentleman from Missouri, I should myself be led to conclude that he had offered his amendment for the special purpose of loading down the bill and defeating it.

Mr. BLAND. I am satisfied if the amendment is not adopted the object of the bill will be defeated. My amendment will protect the laboring men.

Mr. HORR. What we want is not a man belonging to any particular society or association, but a man who will gather the statistics that it is important we should have, no matter what society he belongs to or where he comes from. That is the only point we have in view, and to do that we must trust to the Executive to make his selection of the best man to perform the duty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for debate has expired. The question will now be taken on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BELFORD. I offer the following as an additional section to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain that after the pending amendment is disposed of.

Mr. AIKEN. Is my amendment or substitute not first in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The question will first be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND]; after that the substitute of the gentleman from South Carolina is next in order.

Mr. BLAND. Let the amendment I have proposed be again read.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken; the committee divided, and there were—ayes 29, noes 100.

Mr. COBB. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. COBB and Mr. HOPKINS were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 18, noes 133.

Mr. COBB. Since there is so large a majority against me I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being withdrawn, and no further count being demanded, the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is rejected.

The question is now upon the substitute proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, which will be again read.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken; the House divided, and there were—ayes 75, noes 72.

Mr. HOPKINS. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. HOPKINS and Mr. AIKEN were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 97.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BAYNE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 37, after the word "remedies," insert "and full statistics relating to the immigration and importation of laborers and their employment."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 23, after the word "employed," insert "and the effect of shortening the hours of labor upon production."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 20, after the word "occupation," insert the word "and;" in line 21 strike out the words "and churches;" and in line 31 strike out "and churches."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This amendment makes this portion of the bill correspond with the amendment heretofore made on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON], striking out the word "religious" and inserting the word "moral."

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would like to hear the context read as it will be as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment makes that part of the bill conform to the amendment already adopted, striking out the word "religious" and inserting the word "moral."

Mr. HART. It does not make it conform to that.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would like to have the context read as it will be if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

The number and ages of children, nature of their occupation, and their attendance at school.
Schools, facilities for attending, and extent to which they are enjoyed.

Mr. HART. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 36.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9, strike out "$4,000" and insert "$3,000;" so that it will read: "And shall receive a salary of $3,000 a year."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This will make the salary the same as that of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. KASSON. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Labor what is the salary of the Commissioner of Education?

Mr. HOPKINS. I think it is $3,500. But the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics receives $3,000.

Mr. KASSON. I think the salary should be the same as that of the Commissioner of Education.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HOPKINS. If now in order I would move to amend by making the salary $3,500, so as to correspond with that of the Commissioner of Education.

Mr. KASSON. I think that should be done.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to offer an amendment as an additional section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to extend recognition to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD]; but he would suggest to him that as a matter of convenience if there are further amendments to be offered to the pending section they had better be disposed of before a new section is offered.

Mr. BELFORD. I withhold my amendment for the present.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 17, after the word "thereof," insert the words "with reference to their occupations;" so that it will read:

"The number of persons employed as laborers, with a classification thereof with reference to their occupations."

Mr. CUTCHEON. I do not see that the bill requires that information with reference to occupations.

The question being taken on Mr. CUTCHEON'S amendment, there were—ayes 23, noes 46.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "associations," in line 40, add the following: "and to other organizations and persons."

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 28, noes 51.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I make the point that a quorum has not voted. I think on questions of this kind that we may not make bad precedents we should have the action of a full House.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to have the amendment reported again, as the confusion was such I could not well hear it.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. It is simply to increase the field of investigation.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the gentleman will say "other labor organizations," I am prepared to accept his amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Why limit the commissioner? He ought to have a wide field for his investigations. But I am willing to modify the amendment in accordance with the suggestions of the chairman of the Committee on Labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The point having been made that a quorum has not voted the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. BROWNE, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. HOPKINS.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. At the instance of various gentlemen I withdraw the call for further count.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote on the amendment was ayes 23, noes 46. The call for further count having been withdrawn, the amendment is disagreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I suggest that the vote be taken again by sound.

Mr. HART. I wish to suggest to the Chair that while the matter was pending in regard to the vote by tellers it was agreed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] that the amendment should be accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not advised of any agreement.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that the vote be again taken.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I understood the amendment with the modification suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Labor and accepted by myself was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Labor, said he was willing to accept the amendment with a modification. But the question was before the Committee of the Whole and the Committee of the Whole voted it down. But the Chair is quite willing to submit the question again to the committee if there be no objection.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I object.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move to reconsider the vote.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Then I insist on the demand for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is again raised that a quorum did not vote. The tellers will resume their places.

Mr. CRISP. I make the point that the demand for tellers was withdrawn and the result of the vote was announced.

The CHAIRMAN. There was a misunderstanding. The vote will be again taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I have modified my amendment so that it will read "and other labor organizations and persons."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as now modified.

The amendment as modified was read.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The words "and persons" make the amendment sweeping enough.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will take their places, and members will proceed to vote upon the amendment as modified.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 76, noes 17.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana (one of the tellers). I do not insist upon the point that no quorum voted.

Mr. CRISP. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will resume their places and continue the count.

The tellers concluded the count, and reported that there were—ayes 136, noes 30.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG. I move to amend, in line 29 of the bill, by inserting the word "in," after the word "epidemics;" and to change the words "factory," "mill," "mine" to the plural; and to insert, after the word "mines," so changed, the word "farms."

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. YOUNG; and upon a division there were—ayes 32, noes 65.

Mr. YOUNG. No quorum has voted.

Many MEMBERS. Do not make that point.

Mr. YOUNG. Yes; I want to make members vote.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. YOUNG and Mr. HOPKINS were appointed.

Mr. KASSON. Let the amendment be again read.

The portion of the bill as proposed to be amended was read, as follows:

Epidemics in factories, mills, mines, farms, and dwelling inspections.

Mr. KASSON. That does not read right in that way.

Mr. YOUNG. I withdraw the point that no quorum voted.

No further count being called for, the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD], which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "labor," in line 19, insert the following:

"Labor performed by persons not citizens of the United States, and labor performed by such persons under contract not entered into in the United States."

Mr. HOPKINS. That has already been adopted.

Mr. LAIRD. I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] which has been adopted covers the point I desire to reach with my amendment, and I will therefore withdraw it.

Mr. SPRIGGS. I desire to offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. SCALES. I move that the committee now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SPRIGGS] has the floor to offer an amendment, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, after the word "president," insert the words "and who shall be a member of some trade-union or labor organization."

Also in line 46, after the word "clerk"——

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understood that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] moved that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SPRIGGS] was on the floor at the time, and the Chair could not recognize the gentleman from North Carolina for that purpose. After the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPRIGGS] has been read the Chair will recognize the gentleman from North Carolina.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the amendment, as follows:

Also in line 46, after the word "clerk," insert the words "who shall be a member of some trade-union or labor organization."

Also in line 50, after the word "department," insert the words "each of whom shall be a member of some trade-union or labor organization."

Mr. SCALES. I now move that the committee rise.

Mr. RYAN. Let us pass this bill before we adjourn.

Mr. SCALES. I think it is very evident that we can not finish it to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion that the committee rise is not debatable.

Mr. SPRIGGS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the committee shall now rise will my amendment be the first in order when the consideration of the bill is again resumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be pending; it is now in possession of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to make another parliamentary inquiry.

Suppose that the committee rises and the House adjourns, what will be the position of this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a question for the chairman of the Committee of the Whole to determine.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. If we adjourn now we will kill the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize no gentleman until order has been restored in the committee. It is impossible to transact business without order and the Chair will not attempt to do it. [After a pause.] The Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] for a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. My inquiry is this: Is it not possible for this House, after wasting the entire day on fruitless amendments, to pass this one bill before we adjourn?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that is a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Is it in order now to move a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening?

The CHAIRMAN. A motion for a recess is not in order in Committee of the Whole. The question is now on the motion that the committee rise.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 60, noes 103.

So the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPRIGGS], which has been read.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 15, noes 107.

Mr. BLAND. No quorum has voted.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I desire to have the RECORD show who makes the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. BLAND. I made the point.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I want the people of your district to understand it.

Mr. BLAND. And they will understand you, too.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Is it in order for me to withdraw my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can do so, inasmuch as there has been no decision upon it by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Then, for the purpose of proceeding with the business of the House and passing this bill, I withdraw the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. PEEL, of Arkansas. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BLAND. Has the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPRIGGS] been withdrawn?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been withdrawn.

Mr. BLAND. Then I renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL], who offers an amendment which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

In line 20, after the word "occupation," insert the words "the effect of the different kinds of labor on their growth, development, and health."

Mr. HOPKINS. I accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not accept it; the Committee of the Whole must vote upon it.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BELFORD. I have an amendment at the desk. I desire that it be read and voted upon.

Mr. HOPKINS. I withdraw my motion for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD].

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following as a new section:
"SEC. 2. That no railway corporation or manufacturing establishment shall be allowed to import foreign labor to compete in employment with American citizens."

Mr. HOPKINS. I shall have to raise a point of order on this amendment. In the first place, it is not germane. Again, it is out of order, on the ground that it is the substance of a bill now pending in the House. I have no objection to the proposition when it comes in proper form, as it will in another bill which is on the Calendar.

Mr. BELFORD. Oh, we are told about some other bill that is coming up—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania raises a point of order upon the amendment.

Mr. BELFORD. Will the Chair hear me on that question for a few moments?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman if he desires to controvert the statements of fact made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] as the grounds of the point of order. Those grounds are two: First, that the amendment is not germane; and, second, that it is the substance of another bill. In reference to the first ground the Chair does not desire to hear any discussion.

Mr. BELFORD. I do not wish to embarrass the Chair in the slightest degree, but it seems to me that in this House——

The CHAIRMAN. It is no embarrassment to the Chair. The Chair will hear the gentleman. [A pause.] The Chair sustains the point of order and rules out the amendment.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I move to amend by inserting, after the word "classes," in line 23, the words "the condition of tenement-houses for operatives and the rental thereof."

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. That is right.

Several MEMBERS. No objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAND. I renew the amendment which was offered and withdrawn by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPRIGGS].

Several MEMBERS. What is the amendment?

Mr. BLAND. That the commissioner in charge of this bureau shall be selected from the laboring classes. I want to see the gentlemen who pretend to represent the laboring men and who will vote against that amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Let the amendment be reduced to writing.

Mr. BLAND. It is in writing. It was sent to the desk by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, after the word "resident," insert the words "and who shall be a member of some trade-union or labor organization."
In line 46, after the word "clerk," insert the words "who shall be a member of some trade-union or labor organization."
Line 50, after the word "department," insert the words "each of whom shall be a member of some trade-union or labor organization.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 48, noes 118.

Mr. BLAND. Is that a quorum?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. BLAND. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. AIKEN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "desired," in line 45, down to and including the word "annum," in line 51, and insert "The commissioner shall appoint such assistants as he may deem necessary for the successful working of this bureau: Provided, The total expense shall not exceed $10,000."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BISBEE. As an additional section I offer the amendment which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the preceding section shall not be so construed to authorize any investigation of convict labor in case of persons convicted under the laws of any State, nor of laborers employed in cultivating the soil under private contract.

Mr. BISBEE. I desire to speak upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BISBEE. This is offered as a new section, and, as I understand, it is debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. This must be treated as an amendment to the first section.

Mr. BISBEE. I offer it as an additional section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that debate can not be protracted in that way.

Mr. BISBEE. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a recommendation that it be passed as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1340) to establish and maintain a department of labor statistics, had directed him to report back the same with sundry amendments and with a recommendation that it be passed as amended.

Mr. HOPKINS. I demand the previous question on the amendments and the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. AIKEN. Is it in order to move to recommit the bill with instructions?

The SPEAKER. Not now. [Cries of "Vote!"] Unless a separate vote be asked on some amendment the question will be put on them in gross.

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union were agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOPKINS demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. AIKEN. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Labor with the following instructions:

Strike out all after the enacting clause down to and including the word "commissioner," in tenth line, and insert "the Commissioner of Agriculture, through the bureau of statistics in the Agricultural Department, the committee to report immediately."

[Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. HOPKINS. It is the same proposition that was voted down in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. AIKEN. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to recommit was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BAYNE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 182, nays 19, not voting 121; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. COX] is detained from the House by illness, and that if he were here he would vote "ay."

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I am paired on political questions, but not regarding this of that character, I have voted.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Having charge of the pairs for this side of the House, I desire to say there is no pair with a view to this vote unless it is so specially stated on the face of the pair. As many gentlemen will be announced as paired who would vote the same way on this bill, I thought this announcement was necessary.

The following pairs were announced from the desk:

Mr. SNYDER with Mr. GOFF.

Mr. FOLLETT with Mr. CONNOLLY.

Mr. FYAN with Mr. PETTIBONE.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. WHITE, of Minnesota.

Mr. RANKIN with Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio.

Mr. COOK with Mr. CULLEN.

Mr. SHELLEY with Mr. THOMAS.

Mr. BURNES with Mr. CALKINS.

Mr. MOULTON with Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois.

Mr. DARGAN with Mr. BRUMM.

Mr. GIBSON with Mr. SMALLS.

Mr. LEWIS with Mr. MCCORMICK.

Mr. COVINGTON with Mr. HOLTON.

Mr. BROADHEAD with Mr. BAYNE.

Mr. KEAN with Mr. DIBBLE.

Mr. MULLER with Mr. BREITUNG.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, with Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR.

Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. PHELPS, for this day.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee, with Mr. ANDERSON, for this day.

Mr. HILL with Mr. HOUCK, until April 21.

Mr. REAGAN with Mr. STEPHENSON, until April 24.

Mr. BLACKBURN with Mr. MCKINLEY, until April 21.

Mr. STORM with Mr. O'HARA, until April 22.

Mr. WILKINS with Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey, until April 21.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER with Mr. KEIFER, until April 26.

Mr. THOMPSON with Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, until April 21.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE with Mr. LIBBEY, until April 24.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, with Mr. RUSSELL, until April 29.

Mr. TUCKER with Mr. REED, until April 22.

Mr. GREEN with Mr. HOOPER, until May 4.

Mr. GARRISON with Mr. POLAND, for this day.

Mr. CONVERSE with Mr. MCMILLIN, on the pending bill. Mr. CONVERSE would vote "ay."

Mr. RICE with Mr. MILLS, on the labor bill. Mr. RICE would vote in the affirmative; Mr. MILLS in the negative.

Mr. KETCHAM with Mr. WARNER, of Ohio.

Mr. BARBOUR with Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Mr. WILSON would vote "ay;" Mr. BARBOUR, "no."

Mr. HAMMOND with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, until Monday.

Mr. PAIGE with Mr. THROCKMORTON, on the pending bill. If present, Mr. PAIGE would vote "ay;" Mr. THROCKMORTON "no."

Mr. FORNEY with Mr. BURLEIGH, for this day.

Mr. TALBOTT with Mr. BOUTELLE, for this day.

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. WASHBURN, for this day.

Mr. BUCKNER with Mr. FINERTY, on the pending bill.

Mr. CABELL with Mr. OCHILTREE, for this day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HOPKINS. I now move to amend the title of the bill so as to make it read: "A bill to establish and maintain a bureau of labor statistics."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to reconsider the votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. TALBOTT, for one day, and to Mr. BREITUNG, for two weeks, on account of important business.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOPKINS (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BOYLE: Petitions of wool-growers of Pennsylvania, for the restoration of the tariff of 1867 on imported wool—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MORRILL: Petition of Baxter Post, Grand Army of the Republic, in favor of the legislation asked for by the Grand Army of the Republic committee on pensions, and of the Grand Army of the Republic of Kansas, asking for the passage of the Logan bill in favor of ex-prisoners of war—severally to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. REESE: Petition of citizens of Georgia, relative to national aid to education—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE: Resolution of the senate and assembly of the State of New York, recommending the establishment of a national gun-factory at the Watervliet arsenal, New York, and for the necessary appropriation to conduct the same—to the Committee on Appropriations.

Also, resolutions of the house of assembly of the State of New York, recommending the passage of an act to enable the more efficient enforcement of the law relating to patents, &c.—to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. VANCE: Petition of many citizens of North Carolina, in favor of aid to common schools—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. WASHBURN: Resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Saint Paul, Minn., protesting against any suspension of coinage of the silver dollar—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 21, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE HERNDON.

Mr. KENNA. Mr. President, I observe by the RECORD that on Friday the Senate had under consideration and passed resolutions of respect to the late THOMAS H. HERNDON, of Alabama. I regret that necessary absence prevented my participation in a ceremony in which I had for many reasons so deep a sympathy, and with the consent of the Senate I should like to submit a few remarks at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senator from West Virginia will proceed with his remarks.

Mr. KENNA. Mr. President, my acquaintance with Mr. HERNDON began with the organization of the Forty-sixth Congress. It soon ripened into a mutual friendship, which serves, now that he is departed, to rank my associations with him among the brightest and happiest of memories. I had good opportunity to know him well. I served with him in the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses. We were on the special committee appointed to investigate the Cincinnati elections of 1878. Throughout the time occupied by that inquiry we were constantly together.

I also had the honor of more than a mere acquaintance in his estimable family. He had friends who were my friends; I had friends who were his. Much of our legislative life led in like pathway; much of our representative duty made naturally and rightly common cause. Circumstances over which neither of us had control brought us together; conditions over which neither of us wanted control kept us so. I knew him, therefore, in his representative, personal, family, and even in his special relations to men and measures.

Mr. President, THOMAS H. HERNDON, was a lovable character wherever you found him. He was an upright and a manly man. He was a sincere and true man. He was affectionate and kind and generous. He was a vigorous man and an able one, and yet, combining these qualities in an eminent degree, the simplicity and beauty of his modesty excelled them all. A creature after the image of his Maker, he did as much to raise the standard of human excellence, in my estimation, as any man I ever knew. I have not, I am sure, Mr. President, asked too much in delaying at so late a day the ordinary proceedings of the Senate to add this brief tribute to what has been said of THOMAS H. HERNDON. I do it sincerely. I cherish his memory.

SPANISH TREATY OF 1819.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

In response to the resolution of the Senate of the 5th of December last, respecting the execution by the United States of the ninth article of the treaty of 1819 with Spain, I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State, and its accompanying papers.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, April 18, 1884.

COMMON MERIDIAN OF LONGITUDE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, dated the 16th instant, respecting the approaching international conference at Washington, D. C., for the purpose of fixing upon a meridian proper to be employed as a common zero of longitude and standard of time-reckoning throughout the globe, and recommend that the sum of $10,000 be appropriated to enable the Secretary of State to meet the expenses of the same.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, April 18, 1884.

EMBASSY FROM SIAM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, of the 16th instant, relative to the approaching visit of a special embassy from Siam to the United States, and recommend that the appropriation asked by the Secretary of State to suitably defray the expenses of such embassy while in this country be made.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, April 18, 1884.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Paymaster-General, in which he reduces the estimate "to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for pay, &c., of the Army" from $474,927.76 to $275,000, and recommending the passage of a resolution making available the sum required; which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a tracing of the plat of survey of the unconfirmed private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico, No. 122, known as the Cañon de San Diego grant, Francisco Garcia de Noriega and José Antonio Garcia de Noriega, claimants; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 2031) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near Sibley, in the State of Missouri, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. 6370) to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal-revenue laws was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of the Maritime Association of the port of New York, praying that the coinage of silver dollars may be suspended for a period of two years; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of the Armington & Sims Engine Company, of Providence, R. I., remonstrating against the passage of House bill 3617 and Senate bill 1558, relating to patents; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. CONGER presented resolutions of the Maritime Association of the Port of New York, in favor of an appropriation for the improvement of the Buttermilk Channel, between Governor's Island and the Brooklyn shore; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of John M. Deitz, of Otisco, Ionia County, Michigan, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the memorial of Miles Post, No. 113, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, in favor of legislation in accordance with the recommendations made by the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the memorial of W. J. Kinney, of Muskegon, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of the news-copyright bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILSON presented the following joint resolution of the General Assembly of Iowa; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

[Joint resolution No. 20.]

Joint resolution in relation to swamp-land indemnity.

Whereas the provisions of the act of Congress of March 2, 1855, as extended by act of Congress of March 3, 1857, granting indemnity to the States for swamp and overflowed lands disposed of by the United States, are held not to apply to sales and locations made after March 3, 1857; and

Whereas a large amount of land properly falling to the State and counties in Iowa under the swamp grant have been disposed of by the Government since March 3, 1857, thereby compelling the counties and their grantees to abandon their claim to such lands or litigate with the purchasers of the Government; and

Whereas on the 4th day of February, 1884, the Hon. Mr. COSGROVE introduced a bill (H. R. 4505) in the House of Representatives in Congress to extend said indemnity provisions of said act of March 2, 1855, and making the same applicable to sales and locations made since March 3, 1857, which bill is pending in Congress; and

Whereas under the rulings of the Department, certificates—called scrip, or indemnity scrip—issued for indemnity for swamp lands located with warrants, can not be located on lands outside of the State, and there being no vacant land in Iowa on which such scrip can be located, many of the counties in this State, after great expense, are unable to realize anything for their swamp lands so disposed of by warrant locations, and by that means are damaged to a large amount; and

Whereas on the 6th day of February, 1884, Senator ALLISON introduced a bill (S. 1428) providing, among other things beneficial to the counties of Iowa, for the location of such indemnity scrip on any public lands subject to entry of the United States in any State or Territory, which bill is pending in the Senate: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives in Congress be requested to use all proper and lawful means in their power to secure the passage of both said bills (H. R. 4505 and S. 1428), or by the enactment in some other bill, of provisions substantially the same as therein contained.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of State transmit to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of these resolutions.

Approved April 14, 1884.

STATE OF IOWA, ss:

I hereby certify the foregoing to be a true and correct copy of the original on file in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State at Des Moines this 15th day of April, A. D. 1884.

[SEAL.] J. A. T. HULL, Secretary of State.
W. T. HAMMOND, Deputy.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Ohio; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions, as follows:

[H. J. R. No. 43.]

Joint resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives to vote for and urge the passage of Senate bill No. 11 and House bill No. 1189.

Whereas there has been introduced in the United States Senate bill No. 11, and in the House of Representatives bill No. 1189, asking for pensioning of prisoners of war who were confined in confederate military prisons during the late war Therefore,

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and are hereby, requested to vote for and urge the passage of the same at the earliest practical moment, and that the governor forward a copy of this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Washington.

L. A. BRUNNER,
Speaker pro tempore of the House of Representatives.
JOHN G. WARWICK,
President of the Senate.

Adopted April 11, 1884.

Mr. PLATT presented the following resolutions of the Legislature of Connecticut; which were read and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

GENERAL ASSEMBLY, January Session, 1884.

[House joint resolution No. 202.]

Resolved by this Assembly, That our representatives in the National Congress be requested to use their influence to secure favorable action upon the bill now before Congress creating a commission "whose duty it shall be to inquire into and report upon the material, industrial, and intellectual progress made by the colored people of this country since 1865."

Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

House of representatives, passed April 4, 1884.
Senate, passed April 4, 1884.

Mr. HALE presented resolutions of the Maritime Association of the Port of New York, in favor of legislation to relieve sailing-vessels from State pilotage exactions; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the memorial of W. L. Wheeler and others, soldiers in the late war, touching the needs of veteran soldiers and the extent of their claims upon the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the memorial of James A. Garfield Post, No. 46, Grand Army of the Republic, of Blue Hill, Me., and other ex-soldiers and sailors of the late war, in favor of the recommendations of the pensions committee of the Grand Army of the Republic concerning pensions and the equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL presented a petition of Dr. A. M. Ruggles and 25 others, citizens of Barton, Vt., praying that discriminations in the appointment of surgeons in the Army and Navy as between the allopathic and homeopathic schools of practice be abolished; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GROOME presented the petition of John M. Palmer and 394 others, citizens of Baltimore, Md., praying for such legislation as that proposed in Senate bill 1223, prohibiting discriminations against any school of medicine in appointments to Government service; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I present a petition of many citizens of New Jersey praying that all qualified physicians be made equal before the law in the Government service of the United States, having reference, I suppose, to all grades of physicians and all classes, as allopathic, homeopathic, &c. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCPHERSON presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey; which was read and referred to the Committee on Finance:

[Joint resolution No. 3.]

STATE OF NEW JERSEY.

Joint resolution requesting the repeal of a part of the United States revenue laws relating to alcohol.

1. Whereas the business of the citizens of the State of New Jersey engaged in agricultural pursuits has been injured by the operation of the United States revenue law permitting the manufacture of vinegar from alcohol which has paid no internal-revenue tax; and

Whereas the operation of said internal-revenue law gives opportunity to evade the tax on alcohol made and sold as such: Therefore,

2. Resolved (the senate concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and hereby are, requested to use all honorable means in their power to procure the repeal of so much of the amendment to the United States laws contained in section 5, chapter 125 of general laws passed by the Forty-fifth Congress at the third session, in the year 1879, as authorizes the manufacture of vinegar from alcohol that has paid no internal-revenue tax.

3. And be it further resolved, That the governor of this State be requested to forward copies of the foregoing preamble and resolution to our said Senators and Representatives.

Approved April 8, 1884.

Mr. JONAS presented the petition of Miguel Capella, a citizen of Spain and a resident of New Orleans, praying to be reimbursed for certain lands taken from him by the United States Government; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ALDRICH presented the petition of the Providence (R. I.) Board of Trade, praying for the location of a light-ship, with fog-signal, off Smith's Island, Cape Charles shoal, at the entrance of Chesapeake Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BLAIR presented a petition of citizens of Nashua, N. H., praying an appropriation for the State militia; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of clergymen of the city of Concord, N. H., in favor of the passage of Senate bill 1755, for the amelioration of the condition of the Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BLAIR. I present the claim of William Trefethen for damages done to himself, wife, and son by careless firing from the fort in Portsmouth Harbor, New Hampshire, during the war, by which one son was killed, the wife very seriously hurt, and other injuries done to himself and members of his family. I think perhaps that these papers should go to the Committee on Claims, though I am somewhat uncertain in regard to the proper reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a petition accompanying the papers?

Mr. BLAIR. There is an informal petition with the evidence constituting the claim, which I am requested to file. I ask that the papers be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the papers will be received and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented the petition of Julius M. Keeler, of California, praying to be allowed the amount due him as an officer of the volunteer army for mileage, traveling expenses, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PALMER presented resolutions of H. P. Niles Post, No. 172, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, concerning the pension laws; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the memorial of Hon. William H. Cross, setting forth the necessity of a harbor of refuge at Mackinaw City, Mich.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions of the State board of health of Michigan, in favor of legislation for the prevention of the introduction of infectious diseases into the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

He also presented a petition of committee and officers of the Soldiers and Sailors' Association of Southwestern Michigan, and a petition of Thomas Nicholson and others, of Ortonville, Mich., praying for the establishment of a branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers in Michigan; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of William S. Pardee, late private of Company C, One hundred and twenty-ninth Indiana Volunteers, praying that he be placed on the pension-roll; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented resolutions of the Detroit Board of Trade and Merchants and Manufacturers' Exchange, remonstrating against the further coinage of silver dollars; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I present a petition numerously signed by residents of Wisconsin, praying for the passage of Senate bill 1223. The bill indicated refers to the employment of the different schools of medicine in the Government service, and the petitioners ask that their petition be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Similar petitions have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs under the impression, as the Chair supposes, that most of those surgeons are employed in the Army.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Very well, let this petition have that course.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hold in my hand a similar petition with a request that it go to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, and I think probably it ought to be referred there in deference to the wishes of the petitioners.

I have the memorial of the faculty and students of the Homeopathic Medical College of Missouri protesting against the discrimination that is made in favor of one class of physicians alone in Government employment in all offices except the Pension Office, not in the Army alone, but in all offices except the Pension Office indiscriminately, recommending the passage of Senate bill 1223, and they ask that it be referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

Mr. HAWLEY. Such petitions and memorials have been sent to that committee before. I notice two or three have been presented this morning, and quite a number of petitions and memorials on the same subject have been sent to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection this memorial will be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, and if there be no objection the order referring the prior petitions to the Committee on Military Affairs will be rescinded and the petitions will be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HAWLEY. I present the petition of ex-Governor William T. Minor and 117 others, citizens of Connecticut, to the same effect, and move its reference to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY presented the memorial of the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company and 7 other manufacturers and inventors of Bridgeport, Conn., remonstrating against the repeal or hostile modification of the present patent laws; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. HAMPTON presented a petition of citizens of South Carolina praying for the passage of Senate bill 1223, prohibiting discriminations between the different schools of medicine in appointments to the Government service; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of citizens of Kansas praying for the restoration of the Nez Percé Indians of the Chief Joseph band to their former reservation in the Territory of Idaho; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON presented resolutions adopted by A. P. Morton Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of New Hampton, Iowa, urging the passage of such laws as shall carry into effect the recommendations of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic in regard to pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Guthrie, Iowa, praying for the location of a soldiers' home in the State of Iowa; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the memorial of D. H. Scott, of Griswold, Iowa, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to copyright news matter; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARRISON presented the petition of Dr. T. C. Hunter and 16 other citizens of Indiana, and four other petitions of citizens of Indiana, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 1223) to secure to the medical profession equal rights in the service of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

He also presented the memorial of the Santa Fé (N. Mex.) Board of Trade, asserting that the memorial to Congress signed by the acting officers of the Albuquerque Board of Trade is not true in its statements, and remonstrating against any action on the part of Congress in annulling the laws of the Legislature of that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. CULLOM presented sundry petitions of citizens of Chicago and other cities in Illinois, Iowa, and Minnesota, praying Congress that homeopathic physicians be given the same opportunities as allopathic physicians to enter the Government service; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

He also presented the petition of David E. Ford, late private Company K, Two hundred and ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL presented a petition of citizens of Key West, Fla., praying that a certain sum unjustly collected under judgment from Seidenberg & Co., of Key West, Fla., be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of Rhoden Mitchell, of Washington, D. C., a laborer appointed by a former Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, praying additional compensation for services performed by him; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1402) to prevent the advertisement of lotteries in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States, to prevent the sale of lottery tickets therein, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 2072) to prevent the advertisement of lotteries in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States, to prevent the sale of lottery tickets therein, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. GARLAND. The Committee on the Judiciary have had under consideration the bill (S. 1560) to provide that judges of the United States circuit and district courts shall reduce their instructions to juries to writing in all States wherein by the laws thereof State judges are required so to do, and have directed me to report it adversely, with the statement that the present law, section 914 of the Revised Statutes, sufficiently reaches the object of the bill.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 163) providing for the appointment of clerks of the circuit and district courts in the southern district of Georgia, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. LOGAN. I am also instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 18) proposing an amendment to article 1, section 7, clause 2, of the Constitution of the United States, in relation to the veto power, to report it with an amendment, and I ask that it be placed on the Calendar. I desire to say in reporting the resolution that at as early a day as possible I shall ask the consideration of it by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PUGH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4704) authorizing and empowering the Secretary of War to reconvey to Thomas Mulvihill certain lands erroneously conveyed by him to the United States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1478) defining the powers and jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission, authorizing the appropriation of land and material for the improvement of the Mississippi River and its navigable tributaries, prescribing the manner of assessing damages for property so appropriated, and providing penalties for acts in hinderance or injury of such improvements, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1511) to prohibit officers and employés of the United States from contributing money for political purposes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment; which was agreed to.

PRIVILEGES OF THE FLOOR.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Rules to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That Rule XXXIII of the standing rules of the Senate be amended by inserting after the words "judges of the Court of Claims" the words "Commissioner of Agriculture," and by striking out in line 22 the word "extension."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. FRYE. As that resolution is reported as a new resolution, suggested by one offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], I report adversely the resolution submitted by him.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XXXIII be amended by adding after the words "the heads of Departments," in the seventh line of the rule as printed for the use of the Senate, the following: "including the Commissioner of Agriculture."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the resolution will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. PLUMB. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I ask where on the Calendar the resolution reported by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] from the Committee on Rules goes—at what point of the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Next after the last bill reported from a committee.

Mr. PLUMB. That prevents simply any effect being given practically to that resolution at this session of Congress. If there is a design to specially prevent the Commissioner of Agriculture from a place on this floor, that ought to be manifested by a yea-and-nay vote. There is a person who represents a Department just as absolutely and unqualifiedly, so far as any purpose of coming on this floor is concerned, as any other Department officer does. He represents no other Department officer and is represented by none. There are numbers of bills, including the agricultural appropriation bill, on which it becomes necessary from time to time to consult with the Commissioner of Agriculture. He is entitled, by reason of the fact that he represents the largest and best portion of the American people, to come on this floor just as much as any member of the Cabinet. I regard it as an affront substantially to the agriculturists of this country that this matter has been so long delayed. I therefore move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on Rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the report just made from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FRYE. As this is simply a Senate resolution, I take it there will not be the slightest difficulty any morning after the morning business is through in my calling up the resolution. The committee reported adversely to the resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas, but they reported the same provision in another form.

Mr. PLUMB. I give notice that I shall move to restore the proposition as it was in the original resolution. I want that officer put in exactly where he belongs, next to the heads of Departments; and if the Senator will call up the resolution to-morrow morning I have nothing further to say.

Mr. FRYE. I shall endeavor to call up that resolution; and another resolution I am about to report is a resolution which, to be effective at all, must be acted upon within the next ten days.

WILBUR F. M'DANIEL.

Mr. FRYE. I am also instructed by the Committee on Rules to report favorably the following resolution:

Resolved, That the services of Wilbur F. McDaniel, provided for by Senate resolution of May 20, 1879, be terminated May 1, 1884.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILLIAMS introduced a bill (S. 2073) for the relief of C. D. Pennebaker; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PALMER introduced a bill (S. 2074) for the relief of Mary Howard Farquhar; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2075) granting condemned cannon to the Women's Soldiers' Monument Association of Lansing, Mich.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2076) to donate condemned cast-iron cannon and cannon-balls to Post 41, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, for monumental purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 2077) granting a pension to M. A. Jones; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2078) to amend section 3243 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair has said and I think it would be more convenient if Senators would place in the titles of bills the subjects to which they relate; otherwise we have no means of knowing what the bills are about.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask that the bill may be read in full.

Mr. CONGER. I made the remark merely that the Chair might announce again, as he has on a former occasion, the desirableness of having the subject-matter of bills amending the statutes stated in the title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly it would be a great convenience if the title of the bill should show the subject to which it relates. The bill will be read the second time in full.

The bill was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 3243 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3243. No special tax shall be received or permit or license granted by any collector of internal revenue for the carrying on by any person or persons of the business of a wholesale liquor dealer, a retail liquor dealer, a brewer, a wholesale dealer in malt-liquors, or a retail dealer in malt-liquors, when such business is contrary to the laws of the State or municipality in which such business is sought to be carried on; and the payment of any tax imposed by the internal-revenue laws for carrying on any trade or business shall not be held to exempt any person from any penalty or punishment provided by the laws of any State for carrying on the same within such State, or in any manner to authorize the commencement or continuance of such trade or business contrary to the laws of such State, or in places prohibited by municipal law; nor shall the payment of any such tax be held to prohibit any State from placing a duty or tax on the same trade or business for State or other purposes; and it shall be the duty of any collector of internal revenue, upon request of the prosecuting attorney of any county in his said district, to furnish to the said prosecuting attorney copies of any permits issued for the sale of spirituous or malt-liquors and for the carrying on of any such business within the said county, or information with reference thereto, under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe."

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 2079) for the relief of Mrs. F. Courtney Cochnower; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARRISON. By request I introduce a bill which I have not sufficiently examined to give it my own concurrence, but I think it worthy of examination by the committee.

The bill (S. 2080) to declare and regulate the rank of the officers of the line of the Army was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HALE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2081) for the better protection of life on steamers and sailing vessels of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2082) granting a pension to George W. Nokes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2083) for the relief of Fannie R. Giltner; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 2084) to amend chapter 464 of the acts of the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, entitled "An act to provide for a public building at the city of Fort Wayne, in the State of Indiana;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. JONAS introduced a bill (S. 2085) to provide for the celebration of the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

Mr. SLATER. I ask that the bill (S. 2036) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes, be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the bill indicated by him be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PLUMB. I want to suggest that the Senator's colleague [Mr. DOLPH] some days since expressed a desire to be heard on that bill. He is now absent from the Chamber.

Mr. SLATER. He authorized me to have it taken up and referred to the committee, as he does not desire to make any remarks on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands if there be no objection. That order is entered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 79) granting a pension to Caroline M. McDougal, widow of Rear-Admiral David S. McDougal;

A bill (H. R. 320) granting a pension to Kate Amann;

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 193) to provide for printing certain documents relating to customs revenues and domestic exports for the use of Congress; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 224) granting certain publications to the Cincinnati Law Library.

AMERICAN STATE PAPERS AND SURGICAL HISTORY.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Printing be directed to report to the Senate the cost of reprinting 10,000 copies of the American State Papers and the cost of reprinting 10,000 copies of the Army Medical and Surgical History of the War for the use of the Departments and public libraries and the two Houses of Congress. Also to report what number, if any, of the volumes of either of these books are now in possession of the Government for distribution to public libraries.

SPANISH TREATY OF 1819.

Mr. FRYE. By request I offer the following resolution, and I ask its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to institute negotiations with the Government of the King of Spain for a reference to an umpire for decision of the question whether the treaty of 1819 has been fully carried into effect by the United States, and whether there are obligations under, or growing out of, or in connection with the said treaty which it is claimed that the United States of America have failed to perform and carry out, and to settle and finally decide what amounts remain to be paid by the United States.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

MARY JOYCE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent to place on the Calendar an adverse report which was made by the Committee on Pensions on Senate bill 837.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What was the date of the report?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have sent the report to the Secretary. I think it was made in January. It will require unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the vote of the Senate indefinitely postponing the bill (S. 837) granting a pension to Mary Joyce be reconsidered, and that the bill be placed on the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARLAND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6092) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN FRASER.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to call up a motion for the reconsideration of the bill (S. 830) for the relief of John Fraser, which was entered February 21, 1884.

I intended to present a consideration or two, but was out of the Chamber when the bill was passed, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] who had charge of the bill from the Committee on Claims moved a reconsideration because in my absence the bill was passed. I only desired to make a suggestion in regard to the bill, not to antagonize it. The committee are satisfied that the bill ought to pass as reported. The only question was as to whether John Fraser was an officer of the Government who was prevented from receiving pay for superintending the construction of the building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and also compensation as Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

Mr. HOAR. Let the bill be reconsidered by unanimous consent, and then let the Senator present his views on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 92, being the bill (S. 830) for the relief of John Fraser.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate, and the question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The bill was offered to compensate John Fraser for acting as Supervising Architect of the Treasury when Mr. Hill was suspended. The facts briefly are these: Mr. Fraser, acknowledged to be one of the best architects in this city, was at that time in charge of the construction of the building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and while that work was going on the Supervising Architect, Mr. Hill, was suspended, and the Secretary of the Treasury asked Mr. Fraser to take charge of that office temporarily. It was supposed it would be but for a little time, and not interfere with Mr. Fraser's current business at all; but it so happened that it continued for six months, during which Mr. Fraser gave all his time to the business industriously, faithfully, and well. He discharged the duties as architect of the building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and in addition discharged all the duties of Supervising Architect. The bill as introduced gave him compensation as Supervising Architect, as well as compensation as architect in charge of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. The committee thought it was subject to this criticism, that Mr. Fraser could not receive compensation as Supervising Architect while he also had charge of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. I am satisfied, and I think the Senator is satisfied, that Mr. Fraser in his capacity as architect of the building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was not an officer of the Government, and therefore there was no legal reason why he should not receive full compensation for the services that he performed as Supervising Architect.

With that statement let the bill be read.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska what the object and effect of this motion is. Is it to give Mr. Fraser both salaries, or the highest salary of the two employments which he held?

Mr. VAN WYCK. The object is to give him both. Mr. Fraser was discharging his duty as architect in the construction of the building of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and while he was doing that he was also having his private business, which of course he had a right to do, as architect of different buildings in the city. While doing this the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, Mr. Hill, was suspended, and the Secretary of the Treasury asked Mr. Fraser to discharge the duty, which he did. In doing that he necessarily had to abandon his private business in the city, he still discharging his duty as architect at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. He abandoned all his private business and temporarily discharged the duties of the office of Supervising Architect, devoting to it his entire time and abandoning his other business. Members of the Senate knew that he was engaged in the business at night, and he did it at great sacrifice to himself.

There is no reason that I can see why Mr. Fraser should not receive compensation for the services he performed, and I think, as I stated before, that the Senator from Massachusetts will not insist upon the point, or, at least, I think it will agree with his view of the matter that Mr. Fraser was a mere employé of the Government in what he did as architect of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and, therefore, that the bill as introduced is not liable to criticism.

Mr. PLATT. I was going to ask that question, how came he to be the architect of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing?

Mr. HOAR. If the Senators will pardon me I will state that Mr. Fraser was an eminent architect. I think he lived in Philadelphia originally, but he had an office in this city and was employed as the architect of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, as any architect would be employed on any building by any private person. He might take a dozen such engagements, not as an officer, but as an architect; he might have had a dozen large buildings, dwelling-houses, and others going on for various clients. Then the Supervising Architect of the Treasury having some difficulties, which Senators remember, I suppose, Mr. Fraser was summoned by the Secretary of the Treasury to take charge of that office, simply as an eminent citizen, whose character and standing were absolutely above reproach, to take the office and hold it while the charges were being examined, just as General Grant was called into the War Department in Andrew Johnson's time, and, as I suppose, other eminent citizens are called to the head of a Department. Mr. Fraser went on with his work of superintending the building of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and gave up a great deal of his private employments in order to perform this public duty, and he says he sat up till late hours at night, 10, or 11, or 12 o'clock; it was a very engrossing and laborious performance, and he lost money by reason of the abandonment of private employment.

The committee, wishing to adhere strictly and carefully to the principle of not giving a person compensation for two offices, applied it to this case, and gave Mr. Fraser in the amendment which they adopted the pay of the best paid of the two offices—that is, gave him the pay as Supervising Architect, but did not add that to what he was to receive under his contract as the servant of the Government as architect of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and so the committee amended the bill. After the report was made the Senator from Nebraska and Mr.

Fraser called my attention to it, and I think myself it is a case just on the line where the Senate might very well allow Mr. Fraser the additional compensation without making it a dangerous precedent. At the same time I ought in candor to say to the Senate that Mr. Fraser is a friend of mine, and perhaps I may be biased in his favor by that fact; but one fact is clear, that as the Senator from Nebraska was out when the Senate passed the matter without any examination or discussion, it is proper that the bill should be reconsidered and the Senator from Nebraska have the opportunity to present his views to the Senate. With that statement I do not wish to say anything further.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask for what length of time Mr. Fraser performed the duties of Supervising Architect.

Mr. VAN WYCK. About six months.

Mr. LOGAN. And while performing those duties he received the emoluments of the office?

Mr. HOAR. No; that is what the bill provides for.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It is to pay him as Supervising Architect.

Mr. COCKRELL. He is not satisfied with that.

Mr. LOGAN. Is it proposed to pay both salaries?

Mr. HOAR. He got his pay under his old employment as architect of the building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. The bill proposed to give him in addition to that the pay of Supervising Architect. The committee (I made the report for the committee) amended the bill so as to give him in addition to what he had received as architect of the building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing the difference between that and the pay of Supervising Architect, so that he would get the highest pay; and the question is whether he should have the pay of Supervising Architect, which is the highest pay, or whether he should have both.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the bill that passed?

Mr. HOAR. The amendment was adopted and the bill was passed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It has not passed finally.

Mr. HOAR. There was a motion entered to reconsider.

Mr. LOGAN. As I understand, he received the amount of his pay as architect of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and added to that the bill gives him a certain other amount equal to the amount that he would have received if he had been Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

Mr. HOAR. Yes; that we have done.

Mr. LOGAN. What more would he ask if he had been appointed Supervising Architect in fact? He would only have received that amount.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know whether he would have accepted the office or not.

Mr. LOGAN. He certainly did accept the service for the time being and he received the salary for the time being. What more could he ask than that? Any officer who accepts the performance of the duties of an office accepts it with the understanding that he receives only the salary of the office, and having received that it seems to me that he ought to ask for no more.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am a good friend of Mr. Fraser, for I have employed him in my private capacity and I appointed him to the position named in the bill, but I would not set an example for his benefit that would work infinite injury in the public service. I will state the facts.

Mr. John Fraser, an architect of this city, was employed in superintending the building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. COCKRELL. At $8 a day.

Mr. SHERMAN. At $8 a day according to the law. Some time in May Mr. Hill, on account of a legal controversy in Chicago, was suspended temporarily from the performance of his duties as Supervising Architect, and Mr. Fraser was called upon to perform the formal duty of Mr. Hill in addition to his duty as superintendent. He knew exactly what the law was, that he could get but one compensation. He no doubt was gratified at the appointment because he received the honors of the higher office. I am quite sure that if he had said to me then that he would make the appointment the basis of a claim for double salary I should have declined to appoint him and would have assigned some other, probably a less experienced architect, to perform the formal duties of the Architect's office. As a matter of course he could only be paid $8 a day. Mr. Hill drew the salary of Supervising Architect.

Mr. COCKRELL. During the whole time?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly. He was relieved from indictment and drew the salary. The Government paid both officers both salaries. I venture to say that no one then contemplated that Mr. Fraser should be paid the additional sum of the two salaries. The bill I think very properly gives him the pay of the higher office, as he performed the duties of the office, but the mischief would be infinite by setting an example of this kind.

Take a case that occurred within the last two or three weeks, that of Mr. French, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, who performed the duties of three offices, Secretary of the Treasury and First and Second Assistant Secretaries, for a month or more on account of the illness of his chief. That is a thing that occurs in every Department of the Government. If this kind of a claim can be made it could be made in behalf of an Army officer, who as a lieutenant performs the duties of captain, or who as a major performs the duties of lieutenant-colonel or colonel; and therefore it never would do to establish an example of this kind.

The Senate have done just what is right in giving Mr. Fraser the difference of pay, because no doubt he had to perform additional duty. Even that he is not entitled to receive under the law; but Congress could in this case very properly give him the difference. So he receives under the bill as it now stands at the rate of $4,500 a year, while under the bill as the Senator from Nebraska wishes to have it pass he would receive at the rate of $8,000 a year, or a salary as high as the Secretary of the Treasury, higher than the office itself. As a matter of course that would not be a wise thing to do.

I think the Senate have already done quite right; and now that the matter has been debated, we ought to refuse to reconsider the vote. I speak this with some reluctance, because I have a high opinion of Mr. Fraser. I have no doubt he did his service well; but when he receives the sum given him by the bill as it passed he will be paid probably not as much as he thinks he ought to have, but as much as any officer of his rank receives.

Mr. CONGER. Before the Senator takes his seat I ask him whether Mr. Fraser did receive any more for that time than the pay as architect?

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill as it now stands gives him at the rate of $4,500 a year during the time he was employed in that capacity.

Mr. CONGER. I speak of this because I was boarding at the same place and was familiar with Mr. Fraser at the time of his service. I know he was performing laborious service in the double capacity there during the time, and I think he should have some further pay than his pay as architect of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. I understand the bill gives him additional pay equal to the salary of Supervising Architect.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; at the rate of $4,500 a year.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask what is the difference in the amount that would be granted by the bill as it passed and what is proposed to be given him by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. SHERMAN. Eight hundred dollars.

Mr. HOAR. I will state again, as some Senators do not seem to have understood the prior statement, that Mr. Fraser, being employed at $8 a day for a special duty as architect in his profession, as superintending architect of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing (which is a work which he of course could do with other like work, as all architects do; although they charge by the day, they do not spend the whole day on each house or building that they have under their charge), he was called to be Supervising Architect of the Treasury temporarily, the incumbent of that office having been suspended. He held the office for several months, but has received only his pay as architect of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. A bill was introduced giving him in addition the pay of Supervising Architect, which being referred to the Committee on Claims, they directed me to report the amendment to the bill which allowed him the difference between the two salaries, so that he should get the higher salary instead of the lower. Now, the Senator from Nebraska suggests that under the peculiar circumstances of the case he ought to get both. I think it is a case close to the line, because it is the case of the employment of an eminent architect temporarily to fill the place; but still the committee came to the conclusion, which is stated in the report, that he is to have but one. If the Senate reconsiders the bill, it will be in order to make proper a motion to pay him two salaries. If the Senate leaves it without reconsideration, it will leave the bill as the committee left it.

Mr. COCKRELL. The only reason in the world why I should at all incline to favor the motion to reconsider would be for the purpose of defeating the bill in toto. Here is an employé of the Government under the law drawing his salary and performing the duties and not giving up the office. If he was not satisfied to take the salary allowed him under the law, why did he keep on and come in here, because he may have some personal friends among Senators, and ask that a special bill shall be passed for his relief?

Here is the law; there is no question about it. It prohibits the payment of two salaries when he shall have one office if while performing that by virtue of that he performs the nominal duties of another office, and now the Senator from Nebraska wants to get the two salaries paid to him in direct violation of law. That would be opening the door to millions of dollars. There is not a day but some officer of the Government is by virtue of his position performing the nominal duties of another office. Here is a lieutenant nominally commanding a company; here is a captain nominally commanding a regiment. Are they to be paid the double salaries? The law says they shall only get the one salary, and that the salary of their actual position and employment.

I am sorry to differ with the Committee on Claims in this matter. I think the Committee on Claims would have followed the precedent they have so often established if they had reported the bill adversely.

I am willing to let the bill remain as it is and vote against a reconsideration. It gives him more than he is entitled to receive. It is a gratuity taken out of the Treasury and just given to him without any color or sanction of law.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know that the Senator from Missouri states the case justly; of course he intends to state it fairly. This is not the case of an ordinary employé. It is not the case of an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury performing the duties of his chief for a time. It is just as if Mr. Choate were employed to argue an important cause involving a million dollars for the Government in the Supreme Court of the United States which would occupy him a great space of time and for which a proper fee would be $10,000, and therefore the Department of Justice getting into difficulty by reason of some charge against the Attorney-General, Mr. Choate had consented to give the Department in that particular condition the benefit of his high character and reputation and had become Attorney-General for three months, laying aside all his private business, and he had said, "I think it is fair; I sat up till 12 o'clock at night for weeks and months to do this work; I kept on with the work." It is not the work of an employé; it is the professional work of an architect, a great, famous architect, employed for large buildings, employed in the Government's difficulty to this place because of his high character for integrity and ability, and he goes on and completes the particular job for which he had been previously employed, doing all the work of the other office.

As I said, I came to the conclusion that it was safer and better for the Government to give him but one salary; and so the committee unanimously have held; but I do not think it is fair to attack him as if he were an exorbitant person coming in seeking to draw two salaries. It is not the case of an humble employé having for a little while performed a higher duty. Mr. Fraser's claim, which the Senate is about to reject for both services, is a claim for which there may be advanced in my judgment very strong reasons indeed, and which any honest, fair, moderate man has a perfect right to present and have considered by the Senate. I thought it ought not to be allowed, but I do not think the Senator from Missouri has a just conception of the matter.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suppose Mr. Fraser was 21 years old and of sound mind. He knew the law. There was no compulsion upon him; it was a voluntary matter, and the law gave him no right to claim double pay; but it was done in violation of law. If Mr. Fraser was not satisfied with the pay he was receiving, why did he not give up the place? Why did he not refuse to perform the labor for $8 per day?

Mr. HOAR. Was it for the interests of the Government that an architect who got half through an important public building like the one for that bureau should stop in the middle? But I do not agree that the law applied to his case. I doubt very much whether the architect was an officer in the legal sense. It is a very doubtful question if it did apply to him in its spirit or purpose. However, I will not waste the time of the Senate or of the Senator in discussing what is not before us.

Mr. COCKRELL. He accepted the position knowing the law. It was a free and voluntary matter. He was not compelled to give up his work as architect of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in order to take the other place. It was a matter of voluntary choice. He wanted the honor of the position of acting Supervising Architect of the United States Treasury Department to bring him business afterward. There was some honor in it. When the Senator from Ohio, then Secretary of the Treasury, asked him to act as Supervising Architect he could have declined unless he had been promised additional pay. He did not ask for the additional pay. There was some honor connected with the office, and he was willing to take the honor for the profit it would afterward bring him.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Would it be in order for the Senator from Nebraska to withdraw the motion for reconsideration that he made?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be withdrawn by the consent of the Senate. He can ask leave to withdraw it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I did not intend to provoke so much controversy in this matter as has been had. I supposed the point would be readily seen and acceded to, but in order to prevent further discussion I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks leave to withdraw his motion to reconsider. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and the motion is withdrawn. The bill stands passed. The Chair calls attention to the fact that in the title of the bill the name is spelt with a "z" and in the body of the bill it is spelt with an "s." The Chair understands the correct spelling is in the body of the bill. If there be no objection the title will be amended to conform with the spelling in the body of the bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOAR. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bankruptcy bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Let us go on with the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. If any Senator has anything on the Calendar that he wishes considered I shall postpone my motion until 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the motion withdrawn?

Mr. HOAR. I will withdraw it if any Senator prefers to go on with the Calendar.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think we had better proceed with the Calendar.

PRACTICE IN PATENT SUITS.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I rise, Mr. President, for the purpose of moving that the bill (H. R. 3925) to regulate practice in patent suits, and the bill (S. 1115) to amend section 4919 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the recovery of damages for the infringement of patents, be recommitted to the Committee on Patents. I have the honor to present to the Senate this formidable array of remonstrances against this proposed legislation. [Exhibiting.] These remonstrances are signed by thousands of names asking to be heard before the Committee on Patents on the bills now pending before it in support of the protest they make. They are signed by bankers, merchants, farmers, inventors, capitalists; in short, every branch of industry in the land is represented in these signatures. Considering the vast amount of interests involved in this matter and considering also that all of these interests are to a great extent imperiled and held subject to the wisdom of Congress touching all matters relating to the patent laws, and considering further the very able and exhaustive argument made by the honorable chairman of that committee [Mr. PLATT] upon this subject a few days ago, I have felt emboldened to ask the consent of this committee to review its work, and if possible present to the Senate some more equitable, some better mode of remedying the evils complained of than is found in the bills now before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from New Jersey that his motion is not the subject of debate under the rules.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I supposed I had unanimous consent to give the reasons why the bills should be recommitted. I hope and trust that the Committee on Patents will not object to a recommittal of the bills, for the purpose of allowing these gentlemen to be heard. I think it is only fair to them, and I hope the committee will not object to such disposition of the bills, because they can be reported back in a short time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3925) to regulate practice in patent suits with a view to moving its recommitment. The motion is not open to debate.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire in aid of the motion of the Senator from New Jersey to offer a memorial, very numerously signed in all the large cities of the United States, making the same request that is made by the motion of the Senator from New Jersey. I desire merely to present the memorial that it may have a reference to the Committee on Patents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HARRISON. That proposition——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The subject is not open to debate.

Mr. HARRISON. I think I must object for the present to the consideration of that measure. It will be a special order that will be reached within a day or two, and then the motion will be properly in order and can be properly considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is now in order to proceed to its consideration.

Mr. HARRISON. I think we had better wait.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey. It is not open to debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate, and the Senator from New Jersey moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. CONGER. Let the title of the bill be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 3925) to regulate practice in patent suits.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey now moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 63, being the bill (S. 1115) to amend section 4919 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the recovery of damages for the infringement of patents.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate, and the Senator from New Jersey moves that it be recommitted to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorials presented by the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Illinois will be referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. CONGER. In regard to the last motion to recommit the Chair ordered certain memorials to be referred with the bills to the Committee on Patents. There are other remonstrances and petitions, some of which were presented after the bills were reported, and therefore laid on the table. I ask that all petitions and remonstrances in regard to the subject of the patent laws be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks that all petitions and remonstrances on the subject of patent bills now on the table be referred to the Committee on Patents. That order will be made if there be no objection.

COURTS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. PUGH. I ask that the Senate proceed to consider Order of Business 339, being the bill (H. R. 3931) to create an additional United States judicial district, and to establish circuit and district courts therein, in the State of Alabama.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the counties of Sumter, Greene, Hale, and Pickens, included in the southern district of Alabama, and the counties of Tuscaloosa, Bibb, Shelby, and Talladega, included in the middle district of Alabama, shall be hereafter included in and constitute part of the northern district of said State.

SEC. 2. That the said northern district is hereby divided into two divisions, which shall be known as the northern and southern divisions of the northern district of Alabama. The southern division of said northern district shall include the counties of Sumter, Greene, Hale, Pickens, Tuscaloosa, Lamar, Fayette, Walker, Jefferson, Blount, Bibb, Shelby, Saint Clair, Etowah, Calhoun, Cleburne, Clay, Talladega, Cherokee, and De Kalb; and a term of the district court and circuit court of the United States for said northern district shall be held for said southern division at the city of Birmingham, in said county of Jefferson, twice in each year, on the first Mondays in March and September. The remaining counties in said northern district shall constitute the northern division thereof; and the terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States for said northern division shall be held therein at the times and place now prescribed by law.

SEC. 3. That all offenses hereafter committed in either of said divisions shall be cognizable and indictable within the division where committed; and all grand and petit jurors summoned for service in each division shall be inhabitants thereof; and all offenses committed within either of said districts prior to the time this act goes into operation shall be prosecuted and tried as if this act had not been passed.

SEC. 4. That all civil suits not of a local character which shall be hereafter brought in the circuit or district court of the United States for the northern district of Alabama, in either of said divisions, against a single defendant, or where all the defendants reside in the same division of said district, shall be brought in the division in which the defendant or defendants reside; but if there are two or more defendants, residing in different divisions, such suit may be brought in either division; and all mesne and final process, subject to the provisions of this act, issued in either of said divisions, may be served and executed in either or both of the divisions.

SEC. 5. That all civil suits and proceedings now pending in the circuit or district courts in said State shall not be affected by this act.

SEC. 6. That this act shall be in force from the 1st day of January, 1885; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I did not hear it read fully. But does this provide for the appointment of a marshal and clerk who can perform the duties in this new division of the district?

Mr. PUGH. No, sir; there is no provision for the appointment of any marshal or additional clerk. That is left under the general law. It is wholly unnecessary to have such a provision in the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to add certain counties in Alabama to the northern district therein, and to divide the said northern district after the addition of said counties into two divisions and to prescribe the times and places for holding courts therein, and for other purposes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar will now be proceeded with under Rule VIII. Order of Business No. 237 will be reported.

The bill (S. 1394) for the relief of the trustees of the Southern Illinois Normal University, at Carbondale, Jackson County, Illinois, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that on the 26th of November, 1883, the Southern Illinois Normal University, at Carbondale, Ill., was destroyed by fire; and that the following-named articles (the value of which is unknown) belonging to the United States Government were consumed by the fire: Twenty-seven cadet Springfield rifles, caliber .45; thirty-four bayonet scabbards; thirty-four bayonets; thirty-four McKeever cartridge-boxes; thirty-four waist-belts, old pattern; thirty-four waist-plates, old pattern; three light cavalry sabers. The bill proposes to direct the Secretary of War to cancel any indebtedness that the trustees of the Southern Illinois Normal University may owe the Government of the United States in consequence of said fire.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

HERMAN THEUNE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 38) authorizing the issue of clothing to Sergt. Herman Theune, Company I, Twenty-third United States Infantry. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to issue to Sergt. Herman Theune, Company I, Twenty-third United States Infantry, clothing in lieu of and equal in amount to that lost by him at the burning of the old post hospital at Fort Whipple, Ariz., on the 13th of November, 1874.

Mr. PLATT. Is there a report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no report.

Mr. PLATT. I think somebody ought to explain this measure. By whom is it reported?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN].

Mr. PLATT. I ask that it be passed over without prejudice until the chairman of the committee comes in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice, retaining its place at the head of the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Illinois is now present. I was going to explain the bill, but the Senator from Illinois who reported it can do so.

Mr. PLATT. I withdraw my objection, the Senator from Illinois being in.

Mr. LOGAN. The clothing was lost not by the carelessness of the soldier, and we have usually issued clothing to officers and soldiers under similar circumstances. That is all there is in the case.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY ERBEN.

The bill (S. 1385) to carry into effect the conclusion and recommendation of a board of rear-admirals convened under a joint resolution approved February 5, 1879, in the case of Capt. Henry Erben, United States Navy, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ALEXANDER SMILEY.

The bill (S. 351) for the relief of Alexander Smiley was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment, which was, in line 4, to strike out the words "eight hundred and seventy-four dollars and thirty-eight" and insert in lieu thereof "six hundred and sixty dollars and ninety-four;" so as to read:

That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized and required to remit the amount of $660.94 assessed against Alexander Smiley, proprietor of distillery No. 2, in the county of Mississippi and State of Missouri: Provided, That he shall be satisfied that said Smiley has fully paid to the Government all taxes due for spirits actually made by his distillery from the 1st day of February to the 23d day of April, 1875.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATIONS.

The bill (S. 1581) to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations was announced as next in order.

The bill was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of Friday last; before proceeding with which the Chair will present for reference bills received from the House of Representatives.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following joint resolutions were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 137) for printing the annual reports of the Bureau of Ethnology; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 138) for printing the annual reports of the United States Geological Survey.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 231) providing for the distribution of the Congressional Globe was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

The bill (H. R. 1340) to establish and maintain a bureau of labor and statistics was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. 79) granting a pension to Caroline M. McDougal, widow of Rear-Admiral David S. McDougal;

A bill (H. R. 320) granting a pension to Kate Amann;

A bill (H. R. 406) granting a pension to Catherine Bullard;

A bill (H. R. 1077) granting a pension to Sarah Miner;

A bill (H. R. 1171) granting a pension to Isabel Campbell;

A bill (H. R. 1197) granting a pension to Anna M. Wehe;

A bill (H. R. 1203) granting a pension to Elizabeth Bauer;

A bill (H. R. 1502) granting a pension to William Robinson;

A bill (H. R. 1752) for the relief of Maria L. Lee;

A bill (H. R. 2348) granting a pension to John D. Rickards;

A bill (H. R. 2670) granting a pension to Sarah A. Scott, widow of John D. Scott, deceased, late first lieutenant of Company H, First Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry;

A bill (H. R. 2702) granting a pension to Mrs. Ellida I. Middleton, widow of the late Rear-Admiral Edward Middleton, United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. 2839) to increase the pension of George J. Stannard, late a major-general of volunteers;

A bill (H. R. 3188) granting a pension to Amanda Cutler;

A bill (H. R. 3294) granting a pension to Emma A. Porch;

A bill (H. R. 4014) for the relief of Isaac Reed;

A bill (H. R. 4790) granting a pension to Alexander Saint Bernard;

A bill (H. R. 5069) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary J. Stotts;

A bill (H. R. 5070) granting a pension to Temple Golden;

A bill (H. R. 5464) granting a pension to Clarissa Y. Maies; and

A bill (H. R. 5675) granting a pension to Mrs. Susan J. McKenney.

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1372) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. MORGAN in section 33, line 20, after the word "preferences," to insert:

Or, being insolvent, shall, after the passage of this act, sell or buy, or agree to sell or buy, for delivery at a future period longer than three days from the date of such sale or purchase, any stocks, bonds, or other securities, or, except in the ordinary course of business for the supply of his customers, any grain, food, provisions, provender, or cotton, wool, sugar, salt, or tobacco, without such vender being, at the time of making such contract, the owner, or assignee, or trustee of the property sold, or agreed to be sold, or the authorized agent of such owner. assignee, or trustee.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Alabama will strike out from that amendment the words about his regular customers—I have forgotten the exact phrase——

Mr. MORGAN. The phrase is "for the supply of his customers."

Mr. HOAR. A person who does that "in the ordinary course of business" may have to do it for a new customer, for a person who would not be ordinarily included in that designation.

Mr. MORGAN. I modify my amendment so as to strike out those words.

Mr. HOAR. That being stricken out I am free to say that the Senator has answered by the change of phrase all the arguments which I made against his amendment the other day, so far as I now recollect them. I am still of the opinion that it would be better to have a provision on this subject in a separate bill, not mixing it up with the general subject of bankruptcy, a bill under which there could be penalties imposed in proper cases, and which should regulate the whole subject; but I shall not undertake to interfere with the discretion of the Senator from Alabama in that matter.

Mr. MORGAN. I think that with this provision in the bill it will be a very much stronger bill than it is now. A number of Senators who have conferred with me about it prefer that the amendment should go in. I have therefore modified the amendment as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama a question. I understand what this amendment is for, of course; but does it do anything more than this: If I sell short it is an act of bankruptcy under the amendment; then a petition is presented to put me into bankruptcy, and then the court proceeds to hear, and on the hearing it is found that I am not insolvent at all, but that I am able pay all my debts on call; should I not then be discharged at once?

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. FRYE. Then the only punishment would be that I should be liable to be brought before the court.

Mr. MORGAN. Unless it turned out that you were insolvent.

Mr. FRYE. There is no objection to my being in bankruptcy if I am insolvent; but ordinarily the men who sell short are not insolvent.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] as modified.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALE. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment, as modified, is, after the word "preferences," in section 33, line 20, to insert:

Or, being insolvent, shall, after the passage of this act, sell or buy, or agree to sell or buy, for delivery at a future period longer than three days from the date of such sale or purchase, any stocks, bonds, or other securities, or, except in the ordinary course of business, any grain, food, provisions, provender, or cotton, wool, sugar, salt, or tobacco, without such vender being, at the time of making such contract, the owner, or assignee, or trustee of the property sold, or agreed to be sold, or the authorized agent of such owner, assignee, or trustee.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to inquire whether the selling of grain or such like products at the Chicago Exchange would be understood to be in the regular course of business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as just read, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I have been for some days paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER]. I do not see him in his seat, and so I decline to vote.

Mr. WILSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMDEN. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL]. Not knowing how he would vote if he were here, I refrain from voting.

Mr. LOGAN. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM]. I do not know how he would vote on this amendment. I understand that he is against the bill. I should vote against the amendment if he were here.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN].

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Brown,	George,	McPherson,	Van Wyck,
Call,	Groome,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Plumb,	Walker,
Coke,	Harris,	Pugh,	Williams.
Farley,	Jackson,	Sabin,
Garland,	Lamar,	Slater.

NAYS—27.

Aldrich,	Dawes,	Hill,	Palmer,
Allison,	Dolph,	Hoar,	Pike,
Bayard,	Frye,	Ingalls,	Platt,
Blair,	Gibson,	Jonas,	Riddleberger,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	Jones of Nevada,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Harrison,	Miller of Cal.,	Sewell.
Cullom,	Hawley,	Morrill,

ABSENT—27.

Anthony,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Ransom,
Beck,	Fair,	Mahone,	Saulsbury,
Bowen,	Gorman,	Manderson,	Sherman,
Butler,	Jones of Florida,	Maxey,	Vance,
Camden,	Kenna,	Miller of N. Y.,	Vest,
Cameron of Pa.,	Lapham,	Mitchell,	Wilson.
Colquitt,	Logan,	Pendleton,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senate to the fact that sections 10 and 11 were informally passed over with the privilege of returning to them, as the Chair finds by a memorandum on the desk.

Mr. GEORGE. Is it in order now to offer amendments to section 33 or 35 of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. From the memorandum upon the bill made by the President pro tempore, the Chair inclines to the opinion that it is not now in order to offer amendments to any section except sections 10 and 11. The Chair will state, however, to the Senator from Mississippi that when the bill is reported to the Senate it will be in order to offer amendments to any section.

Mr. GEORGE. I had the impression that that portion of the bill relating to involuntary bankruptcy could be returned to under an agreement. I may be mistaken as to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not able to state, having no recollection and no information. The Chair understands not.

Mr. GEORGE. I will offer my amendments in the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole? Shall the question be taken on concurring in the amendments separately or in gross? If there be no objection, the Chair will put the question on the amendments in gross.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. In section 1, line 32, after the word "publishers," I move to insert "except publishers of newspapers;" so as to read:

"Trader" shall include all merchants, all who make it their business or a part of their business to buy or sell lands, goods, chattels, bills, bonds, notes, stocks, or shares, manufacturers, warehousemen, bankers, brokers, builders, contractors, shipwrights, publishers, except publishers of newspapers, innkeepers, livery-stable keepers, and all artisans who buy the materials for their business on credit.

The effect of the amendment is to withdraw publishers of newspapers from the class of traders against whom involuntary bankruptcy proceedings may be instituted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. HOAR. The business of publishing newspapers is very largely done now (not exclusively by any means) by corporations or joint stock companies, almost always where the newspaper has a considerable circulation; so that the exception which the Senator makes would not relieve a great many individuals. These are a class of persons also whose business goes beyond State lines. They are large buyers of paper, of course. That is their great purchase. Then they are very large employers of labor. So the effect of the Senator's amendment is to put this class of persons and corporations out of the reach of their laborers or employés for compulsory process, and if they were excepted from the voluntary part it would have the effect of preventing their getting a discharge. But I do not understand that the Senator means to except them from the voluntary part.

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir.

Mr. HOAR. I do not see any reason why a publisher of a large newspaper should not stand as liable to be required to make an equal division of his property among his creditors (who are almost always, with the exception of the men who supply him his paper and materials, the workmen in his office—jobbers, job-printers, journeymen) as any other class of men.

Mr. GEORGE. I will state the reasons which induced me to offer the amendment. In the first place, publishers of newspapers are not traders in the ordinary sense of the term. They do not buy to sell again. They buy materials, work them up, and then sell again.

In the next place, the history of this country shows that if some of the largest and most influential papers had been subjected to the harsh provisions of this proposed law they would have been failures. The starting of a large newspaper is a very serious enterprise, as I understand, and they frequently struggle through years of adversity, relying upon the indulgence of their creditors to enable them to make a success. If an enterprise of that sort were started under the provisions of this bill, as soon as there should be a failure on the part of the publishers to pay their debts or any of them within thirty days after they fell due there would be an end of the enterprise.

Again, I object to the provision as it is found in the bill for the reason that it will enable persons who desire to break down a rival newspaper or to control its opinions to go into the market when nobody is disturbing it, when it is behind, but when its creditors are willing to indulge it, and to buy up its paper and either control its political opinions or destroy it. I think no newspaper ought to be subjected to an influence of that sort.

Mr. HOAR. My honorable friend from Mississippi seems to base nearly all his amendments on the ground that involuntary bankruptcy is a certain hardship or power over a man who can not pay his debts which would not otherwise exist. That is an unsound view of this proceeding. If the man is in debt and there is a single creditor of his—and of course he can not be put into involuntary bankruptcy without the consent of a number of creditors ordinarily——

Mr. GEORGE. Only three.

Mr. HOAR. Well, three. If there is a single creditor of his who wants to attach his property and seize it on execution and get a preference to himself he can do it. He can do everything that the Senator says if this proposed bankrupt law does not pass, or if it remains as it is, as to the particular class of persons he wants to except from it.

The only function of a bankruptcy bill, so far as it contains clauses of involuntary bankruptcy, is to take away from the debtor the power of preferring special creditors and compelling him to treat all creditors alike. That is all there is of it. The involuntary bankrupt gets his discharge; he gets all the indulgence of the act; he gets all the benefit of the act as much as the voluntary bankrupt; but the statute comes in and says that in certain cases if you owe debts you shall not allow an individual creditor to come in and attach your property on mesne process in States where that exists, or to seize it on execution in States where that alone exists, and take it to himself; you shall divide it equally. That is all there is in involuntary bankruptcy. In the case of an honest man he gets his discharge.

Now, why should not the great joint stock company that runs the New York Tribune, or the Boston Herald, or any other of the great newspapers of the country in our large cities and towns, if they can not pay their debts, be compelled by their laborers to divide equally with them?

Remember, Mr. President, and I should like to have my friend from Mississippi remember, that at common law there is no preference of the laborer. At common law the workman is not preferred to the United States with its tax or its debt, or to the State with its tax or its debt. At common law the first come is first served. The creditor to whom the debtor confides his purpose to fail, and to whom he makes a favorite preferment, gets it. The bankrupt law comes in and says, "If you are in difficulties you shall divide equally, and then you shall have your discharge if you act honestly, just as you would do if you went in yourself;" but the laborer shall be preferred according to the very liberal amendment in which my honorable friend from Mississippi had so considerable a part, enlarging even the liberal provisions of the bill. In bankruptcy the laborer shall stand before the United States and before the State.

My honorable friend's amendment is that if a great newspaper corporation wants to fail the laborers shall not have all this advantage; if a great newspaper wants to fail the man who is secretary, or president, or a director of that corporation may put off his hands. It is not for the interest of that man, suppose him to be looking after his selfish interests, to prefer his laborers. He can discharge a hundred or five hundred type-setters or the men who run the engine, and a thousand more throughout the country are ready to take their places; but in order to start again he wants to get his credit with the great manufacturer who furnishes him with paper; he wants to get his credit with the banks who discount his notes, and therefore he prefers that class of creditors, and if he is a selfish man he will let the laborers whistle. Now comes in my friend from Mississippi and says: "Oh, no; he shall do all that if he is the publisher of a newspaper." So his amendment of to-day seems to be in very great conflict with the very liberal amendment which on his motion the Senate passed last week.

Mr. GEORGE. My friend from Massachusetts is so ingenious that he has succeeded in putting me on the side of the question which he occupied and putting himself on the side which I occupied in this amendment.

It is true that some newspapers are very rich, including those he has named, but I will venture to say that there are few, if any, of the very large and very influential papers published in this country which did not in their inception, in their youth, struggle through a period of embarrassment and inability to meet their debts within thirty days after they fell due, and if such a bankruptcy law as the pending measure had been enforced against them those enterprises never would have ripened into the greatness and eminence which they afterward attained. This bill subjecting the publishers of newspapers to the involuntary feature of bankruptcy proceedings in effect prevents the establishment of any new paper or the attempt to establish any new paper except by large capitalists who can furnish the money to put the newspaper over the trouble which all newspapers incur when they are first started.

The Senator insists that if I insert in the bill "except publishers of newspapers" the result will be that the type-setters in the great newspaper offices of this country will not be paid. I might ask the Senator, are they paid to-day? He would be obliged to answer that they are, because without the payment of the type-setters I should like to know how the paper could be published. If they are paid to-day they are paid under the very same law exactly that would exist with reference to them after the passage of this act. It is the same as exists with reference to them to-day. There is now no bankrupt law. There is no provision now requiring the publisher of a newspaper to divide out his assets equally among his laborers and other creditors; and yet he does pay the workmen because he is obliged to pay them to get out his paper. What I want to do is to prevent this proposed bankrupt law from taking effect as to a newspaper publisher so that, owing his printers and other laborers, he may be proceeded against because he may be in default to some person from whom he bought paper, and, being thus proceeded against, I wish to have him prevented from paying the parties who furnished him material in preference to his employés. That is the attitude of the question, and not as presented by my friend from Massachusetts.

There is no reason for the provision as it stands in the bill. There is no demand for it. There is nobody in this country clamoring to put newspapers on the list of traders against whom involuntary proceedings in bankruptcy can be instituted. I understand the clamor to be by the large capitalists in the great cities of this country to have an involuntary bankruptcy law as against their country customers. That is the great demand. I have heard it suggested nowhere, nobody has been making any complaint that the newspapers of the country are not complying with their agreements honestly and fairly, or if they are behind at any time—as all of them have been at some period of their lives—that they are not paying their debts as they ought to pay them. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. GEORGE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GARLAND. I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi a little change in the amendment. The word "publishers," in line 32, is intended to be a specification of what is meant by "traders." The definition is given there and afterward in line 34, "but shall not include persons who buy goods and merchandise for sale only to their attendants, employés," &c. After the word "laborers," in line 35, I suggest the amendment "nor publishers of newspapers."

Mr. GEORGE. Very well.

Mr. GARLAND. That I think makes a suggestive difference between the two expressions as they occur there, which is really the gist of the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi. In line 32, where they make a profit by buying and selling other matters of publication, books, &c., they ought to be left there. I concur with the Senator from Mississippi, that if they are publishers of newspapers merely, they should be exempt, and therefore there should be a negation of the word "trader" in line 27.

Mr. GEORGE. I adopt the suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi propose so to modify the amendment?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir; I will insert the words at the point indicated by the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That can only be done by unanimous consent, as the yeas and nays have been ordered upon the amendment as offered. Is there objection to the Senator from Mississippi modifying his amendment? The Chair hears none, and it is so modified. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi as modified.

Mr. GEORGE. I will put in the amendment in line 41 after the word "sale."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will insert it and report.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 41, after the word "sale," it is proposed to insert the words "nor publishers of newspapers;" so as to read:

Nor publishers of newspapers, unless such persons so excluded be otherwise traders within the meaning of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK (when Mr. DAWES's name was called). The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is absent temporarily, and requested me to pair with him. I think he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. COKE (when Mr. MAXEY's name was called). My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is in Texas at this time, and is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN]. If he were here I should vote "yea."

Mr. WILSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HAMPTON. My colleague [Mr. BUTLER] has been called away. During his absence he is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. I make the announcement for the day.

Mr. KENNA. I am paired on all questions with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. CAMDEN. I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] during his absence.

Mr. LOGAN. Since pairing with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] the pair has been transferred to the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM], both being absent, so that I am released. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Brown,	Garland,	Jonas,	Van Wyck,
Call,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Groome,	Morgan,	Walker,
Coke,	Hampton,	Pugh,	Williams.
Colquitt,	Harris,	Slater,
Conger,	Jackson,	Vance,

NAYS—26.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Hoar,	Platt,
Allison,	Frye,	Ingalls,	Riddleberger,
Bayard,	Gibson,	Jones of Nevada,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Hale,	Logan,	Sewell,
Bowen,	Harrison,	Morrill,	Sherman.
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Palmer,
Cullom,	Hill,	Pike,

ABSENT—28.

Anthony,	Fair,	McPherson,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Farley,	Mahone,	Plumb,
Butler,	Gorman,	Manderson,	Ransom,
Camden,	Kenna,	Maxey,	Sabin,
Cameron of Pa.,	Lamar,	Miller of Cal.,	Saulsbury,
Dawes,	Lapham,	Miller of N. Y.,	Vest,
Edmunds,	McMillan,	Mitchell,	Wilson.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. At the same point, section 1, line 41, after the word "sale," I move to insert:

Nor any publisher of a newspaper whose capital invested in his business shall not exceed $5,000, exclusive of the good-will in said business.

My purpose is that the little country papers shall not be subject to these involuntary proceedings. I call for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. Five thousand dollars capital would be the basis of a very considerable country newspaper office in any part of the country besides Mississippi. It seems to me if the Senator wants to include only country newspapers he had better put the amount a good deal less than $5,000, because that would cover a dozen country newspapers in the part of the country in which I live.

Mr. GEORGE. I think that is low enough. If that will not do, we can go a little lower the next time.

Mr. HOAR. How is it possible on an application in involuntary bankruptcy to settle the question of the amount of capital a man has in his business and what his good-will is worth?

Mr. GEORGE. "Exclusive of the good-will."

Mr. HOAR. I know; but you have to settle what the good-will is worth then.

Mr. GEORGE. I suppose there would be no difficulty in one of the bankruptcy courts finding out how much capital a man has.

Mr. HOAR. It would involve a long inquiry. There is now one single act of bankruptcy, the simple ascertainment of the amount of the man's debts and of the amount and value of the assets. Now, you propose to complicate the bill with what no bankruptcy system ever had in it or ever could have in it and work, by causing injuiries as to the value of a man's good-will and as to the amount of capital he has in the business. It is on utterly impracticable amendment. I hope it will be voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a second to the demand for the yeas and nays?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. VANCE (when Mr. RANSOM'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. RANSOM] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM].

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN].

Mr. WILSON (when his name was called). I desire to state that my pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] extends to all questions connected with this bill.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 14, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—14.

Brown,	George,	Slater,	Walker,
Call,	Groome,	Vance,	Williams.
Coke,	Harris,	Van Wyck,

Colquitt,	Lamar,	Mitchell,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. I now offer an amendment, and I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to it, to remove an ambiguity which I think exists in the bill. In section 1, at the end of line 37, I move to insert the words "buy materials for their business, if they;" so as to read:

Nor mechanics of any kind who buy materials for their business, if they habitually labor at their trade.

Mr. HOAR. I am quite sure of satisfying the Senator from Mississippi so that he will not press that amendment. I think the Senator will see that this strikes at all mechanics who habitually labor at their trade, whether they buy materials for it or not. If a mechanic habitually labors at his trade and does not buy materials for it, the Senator's amendment leaves him subject to the bankruptcy law. In other words, he has moved an amendment which makes the mere laboring mechanic subject to involuntary bankruptcy proceedings when the laboring mechanic who buys material also is not subject. The bill includes both. If the man's business is that of a mechanic and he habitually labors at his trade he is not the subject of involuntary bankruptcy.

Let me repeat: the Senator wants to limit as far as possible the province of involuntary bankruptcy; he does not want a mechanic made the subject of it at all. The bill says that mechanics who habitually labor at their trade shall not be the subject of it. Although they may buy the materials upon which they labor, still they are not the subject of it. Now, the Senator wants to amend by adding mechanics who labor at their trade and buy materials, so that the man who labors at his trade but does not buy materials, who is a still smaller one, is left to be the subject of involuntary proceedings, and the Senator's amendment is defeating his own object.

Mr. GEORGE. I am very much obliged to the Senator for making that explanation, though it is not worth a cent. His argument would do if it were not for the last two lines of the section, "unless such persons so excluded be otherwise traders within the meaning of this act." Of course a mechanic who labors at his trade would not, because he is a mere mechanic laboring at his trade, be under any circumstances a trader under the definition of the act; but suppose he buys material, then by force of the last two lines in the section he would become subject to the provisions of the act as a trader. Now, if the Senator will strike out "unless such persons so excluded be otherwise traders within the meaning of this act," I shall withdraw my amendment. Without such erasure the thing stands thus: A mechanic who labors at his trade and does nothing more under another definition in this proposed act can be a trader, but it is because he may do something more, he may add to his labor as a mechanic something of the business of a trader which will subject him to the provisions of this act, and by force of the last two lines, to which I have called attention, although he might be a mechanic laboring at his trade, yet if he bought his materials he would be liable to the provisions of this act. So the effect of my amendment is to say that although he may be the purchaser of his materials, yet if he habitually labors at his vocation he shall not be a trader within the meaning of this act.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to add one word. The act perfectly protects that class of persons now. It is well settled everywhere in the law that a man who buys material which he makes up into an article which he sells, the product of his labor, is not a trader or seller. The familiar exposition of the statute of frauds is that a contract for the sale of goods of more than $50 in value must be in writing to be binding, but it is well settled that a man who contracts to make and sell a wagon, which he makes and sells, is not within the prohibition of that statute.

Mr. GEORGE. That would be a very good answer to my suggestion if it were not for the word "manufacturers," which is contained in the bill as one of the classes who are to be deemed "traders." Where is the line between a mechanic who works at his trade and makes a wagon or a plow and the manufacturer? Where does one commence and the other end?

Mr. HOAR. Will my friend allow me to ask him if he means to exclude all manufacturers from the bill?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir, I do not; but I do mean to say that if mechanics were not specifically excepted they would be included under the term "manufacturers."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. In section 33, line 20, I move to strike out the words "or without" before "preferences," and to insert after "preferences" the words "prohibited by this act;" so as to read:

Or who, being insolvent, makes a preference to any creditor as hereinafter defined, or makes an assignment for the benefit of existing creditors with preferences prohibited by this act, shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy.

The object of the amendment is simply to allow an insolvent debtor to make an assignment if in making it he gives no preferences to any one, but provides for all, or at least makes no preferences prohibited by this act.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator proposes to allow what is void by common law, certainly in my State, and in most of the States what is void under the statute of Elizabeth. No man has a right at common law, as interpreted, I venture to say, in most of the States, and perhaps in all the States in this country, to say, "I will put beyond the reach of attachment and beyond the reach of the law my property for the benefit of my creditors." He may make a preference at common law, and he may convey to a trustee, if the creditors assent; but if they do not assent he has no right to say, "I will put my property where the law can not reach it and make my creditors rely upon fidelity to some instrument that I put in the place of the methods provided by law." To say that a man may do that, and in that way put his property beyond the reach of the bankrupt law, is enacting in this measure a privilege which the common law itself nowhere allows.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not agree with the Senator that at common law an insolvent may not divide his property out, assigning it to his creditors equally. Certainly a law which would allow a man to assign all his property for the benefit of one creditor or two creditors would not prevent him from assigning it for the benefit of all his creditors. But if I were mistaken on that subject, this whole bill is overturning the common law, and it would be right and proper in that case to make the exception or the repeal of the common law which this amendment of mine attempts to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. At the end of section 33 I propose to amend by inserting the following words, which were taken literally from the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee at the last Congress, defining what insolvency means:

Insolvency under this act shall be deemed to exist only when the debtor's liabilities exceed in amount the value of his property liable to execution and the available debts due him.

On that I call for the yeas and nays. I do not care to argue it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are demanded on agreeing to this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. It is true this language was included in one bill reported to the Senate, but I think I am not stating anything which is in error in saying that every gentleman who favored that bill was satisfied before the matter was over that that definition would not answer; that it was not a sound or correct one, and if that bill had passed it would have passed with a striking out of that provision, because it is very clear that a man may be not only unable to pay his debts but unwilling to pay his debts, and may be meditating all manner of preferences or withdrawal, whose property at a particular time might be valued at a sum more than the whole of his debts.

Solvency is a business term well-settled in the law. It is a practical question. It is the ability to pay your debts not necessarily at the given hour or day, but, as business men use the phrase, within a reasonable time and in the course of business. There is one illustration which shows what it is. Suppose, Mr. President, you lent to some young man who is your friend a sum of money to educate him for a profession, to hire and furnish an office and buy a law library, and he gives you his note for three or four thousand dollars on demand. You do not expect to call for that money until the young man has earned it in the course of his business. You may not do so for several years. Although that man has not a dollar in the world, and although he owes a note on demand by its terms of three or four thousand dollars, he is not insolvent within the meaning of the law. There is no debt which in the course of business anybody proposes to exact from him, and which he is called upon to pay. But you lose your confidence in him; he takes to gambling, and you come to the conclusion that you will demand that debt, and put it in suit. That very change of purpose on your part makes him insolvent, because he can not pay the debt, it being demanded of him in the ordinary way.

The Senator's definition of insolvency will fail everywhere. No insolvent system which took that for the definition would do justice to anybody.

Mr. GEORGE. I send to the Clerk's desk the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I ask to have read an extract from the speech of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] on this subject, made on the 7th of December, 1882, as the best reply to the argument made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The matter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The bill on page 3 reads:

"Insolvency under this act shall be deemed to exist only when the debtor's liabilities exceed in amount the value of his property liable to execution and the available debts due him."

When the bankrupt act of 1867 was passed, upon a reading of it most carefully it was my opinion that the word "insolvency" in that act meant what this bill now defines that it shall be if it becomes a law; but upon the first case that was made raising that question the courts adjudicated that such was not the case; that insolvency meant, without regard to the assets of the debtor, without regard to the balances, as to whether he was worth more than he owed, as we say, that if he did not pay his commercial paper or his debts as they fell due in fourteen days he was an insolvent within the meaning of that act. I thought then, as I have thought since and now think, that that is not proper. I do not think the country should have an act of bankruptcy of that character.

To put the Senate in full possession of the question I will refer to the case I alluded to just now, in 13 Wallace, the case of Toof vs. Martin, commencing upon page 40. The question presented there was this:

"Did the inability of Haines & Co."—

Who were the bankrupts, so called—

"to pay their debts in money as they fell due constitute 'insolvency,' within the meaning of the bankrupt act, on their part? Now, 'insolvency' does not mean inability to pay in money. An insolvent is one who can not pay or who does not pay his debts, or whose debts can not be collected out of his means by legal process. (2 Burrill's Law Dictionary, title Insolvent.)

"By universal acceptation of the word in this country and in England, if a party's available means which he can use in paying his debts exceed those debts he has never been deemed insolvent"—

Referring to the authorities.

"If even there are debts due which the party is unable to meet; yet if by arrangements made with his creditors, their promises to aid him, his assets overbalancing his debts, his credit good, and his prospects in business for the future encouraging, he still goes on in his business, he is not insolvent."

That was the argument which I pressed before the Supreme Court in the case of Toof vs. Martin as an exposition, as an interpretation of the act of 1867. Upon that point the Supreme Court, affirming the decision of the court below, ruled against me, and held that "insolvency," as used in the bankrupt act and applied to traders and merchants, is—

"The inability of a party to pay his debts as they become due in the ordinary course of business."

Of course we have to yield that such is the legal construction of that act; the highest tribunal in the land has settled it. I wish to make specific in this act a different conclusion. For example, take the administration of estates in probate courts, or by whatever name you may call them in the different States. A man's estate is not adjudged to be insolvent as long as his available assets overbalance his debts. Under this decision, in an agricultural country like that of my State, and the State of the honorable Senator on my left [Mr. GEORGE], and your State, sir [Mr. COCKRELL in the chair], there would not be, I undertake to say, in the large cities ten firms who were solvent; for with our annual return of crops, at the maturing of them, with the coming on of the red leaves of autumn and the gathering of them with the frosts of the winter, is the only time when we have capital upon which to pay our debts. They are not like Eastern States, which turn out every day their manufactures and turn out everything that can bring money.

We have our annual time of settlement, which is based in one State upon cotton, in another upon sugar, in another upon hemp and tobacco, by the annual recurrence of these crops. A man might have $20,000 worth of these goods under that act, and owe $500 only, and have $10,000 worth of debts. The very best men in the country could not get money because the crops were not in, and under that decision they would be adjudged insolvent. That I wish to remove under the bankrupt bill that is to be made a law, if you pass any at all. It is a serious and an important consideration for the country. As Judge Field, who delivers the opinion of the court, says, yielding to the force of the argument that was pressed, insolvency could not be held to mean the same thing, even under the strained construction of that act, in all parts of the country.

Mr. GEORGE. I rest the defense of my amendment upon the extract which has just been read from the speech of the Senator from Arkansas on that subject, delivered less than two years ago.

Mr. GARLAND. This is a very important question in this proceeding, and is one which has caused me more thought and study than all others connected with the bankruptcy bill. The Supreme Court, as I stated in the remarks which the Senator from Mississippi has had read at the Clerk's desk, gave the former law of 1867 what I consider a harsh and rigid interpretation of the word "insolvency," and the court in delivering that opinion even itself intimated that probably there would not be a uniformity of interpretation all over the country. Other authorities followed that, but some of them in a qualified manner. I will read from a collection of them, not detaining the Senate long, in which it is stated:

Insolvency, in the sense in which the word is used in the bankrupt law, means an inability to pay debts in the ordinary course of business. The amount of the debtor's property as compared with his debts is of no consequence if the alleged bankrupt is unable to pay the demands against him as they mature, in money.

Referring to some six or seven cases besides the one I alluded to in the remarks which have just been read, the author proceeds:

The definition of insolvency usually given in commercial circles should not be applied in country places or to others than traders. (In re Miller, 3 B. R., 225; Hall vs. Wager, 5 id., 182.)—Blumenstiel's Law and Practice in Bankruptcy, page 93.

When the bill was reported by the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], which I favored over two years ago, called the bankruptcy bill, by proceedings in the nature of a creditor's bill, the committee reported favorably the suggestion that is now made by the Senator from Mississippi. That form of proceeding or that character of bill was voted down by the committee at this session, and the one that we have before us in the main substituted in its place. When we came in the discussion to this matter of insolvency the same question was brought up before the committee that is now proposed by the Senator from Mississippi; and as a compromise, upon the idea of taking the harsh and unbending theory of insolvency, as interpreted by the court in the case of Toof vs. Martin, and others, subsequent to that time as applying to centers otherwise than commercial, the committee agreed upon the proviso on page 22, in section 33, beginning at line 49:

That if the debtor shall make oath that his property liable to be applied under this act to the payment of his debts provable under the same exceeds in value the amount of such debts, and he expects and intends to resume payment, and therefore to pay his said debts in full, the court on being satisfied of the truth of said allegations may, if justice require, postpone hearing on said petition for a period not exceeding ninety days, and may meantime make such order as it shall deem necessary and expedient to enable the debtor to apply his property to the satisfaction of his debts, and if within said period the debtor shall have resumed payment, may cause the proceedings to be staid.

The committee agreed upon this proviso as a compromise between the two ideas, the one defining insolvency as the Senator from Mississippi now seeks to define it, and the other leaving it upon the harsh construction, as I have always believed, given by the courts under the act of 1867. If it is left to the simple word "insolvency" for the court to interpret and bend about in agricultural sections and commercial centers and vice versa, there would be necessarily a lack of uniformity in the construction of this law in the different sections of the country. So we considered that it was best to let the party come in and upon his oath to the court and such other testimony and facts surrounding the whole case as the court might have before it, make an order suspending the operation of the law for any time not exceeding ninety days to allow this person to see whether by proper disposition of his assets he could meet his debts.

I think, after all the consideration I could give it, this is a better disposition of the matter than the amendment now offered by the Senator from Mississippi, which I did favor under the bill heretofore reported by the Senator from Kansas.

If it be deemed necessary the time might be extended, and instead of ninety days put it four months, or five months, or six months if you please, and I believe that under the general framework of this bill and the theory accompanying it, this is a better disposition than to make any definition of insolvency as applied to different sections of the country. This proviso applies to all alike, commercial centers, so to speak, the agricultural sections, and so on; and after very careful, and I may say painful, investigation of this subject—because this particular point affects my constituency more than any other embodied in the bill—I think this is a better solution of the matter than to attempt to give a definition in the act to insolvency.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, with due deference to the Senator from Arkansas, I do not think that the proviso on which he relies has the effect he expects it to have. In the first place the proviso is subject to very serious objection, for it leaves it to the discretion of the court to make its will the law of the land instead of the written law itself. Where the discretion of a judge commences there also commences tyranny. It is left entirely to him. If he has a friend, if he has a favorite whom he desires to advance or favor, he may make the order. If the party before him stands in no such relations to him he is under no obligation to make the order. The language of the proviso is:

The court, on being satisfied of the truth of said allegations, may, if justice require, postpone hearing on said petition for a period not exceeding ninety days.

I do not want it left to the discretion of any judge to say whether this citizen, this debtor, shall have the privilege of going on with his business and have that privilege granted to him, and that citizen shall not have it. If we pass the law we ought to make it for all alike, whether they happen to be the friends of the court or not. We are not here to turn over the fortunes of our constituents to the mere discretion of a judge. Let him be bound by the law, let him administer the law; do not give him any discretion about it. I can see that very great wrong may be perpetrated under it. In some instances, as I have intimated, this privilege may be granted to the friends and favorites of the judge, those whom he knows, and who may be unworthy, and in other instances it may be refused to those who most deserve it. I am unwilling to leave the fortunes of our people to any such discretion of any man or any court, and I may add here what I said the other day, that there is no tribunal, there is no agency which is so ill qualified to administer a bankrupt's estate or to attend to business as a court.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK (when the name of Mr. DAWES was called). The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is absent, and I am paired with him. If present, he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 11, nay 34; as follows:

YEAS—11.

Brown,	George,	Slater,	Voorhees,
Call,	Hampton,	Vance,	Walker.
Coke,	Pugh,	Van Wyck,

NAYS—34.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Pike,
Allison,	Frye,	Jackson,	Platt,
Bayard,	Garland,	Jonas,	Plumb,
Blair,	Gorman,	Jones of Nevada,	Riddleberger,
Bowen,	Hale,	Logan,	Sabin,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Hawley,	Miller of Cal.,	Sewell.
Cullom,	Hill,	Morrill,
Dolph,	Hoar,	Palmer,

ABSENT—31.

Anthony,	Fair,	Lapham,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Farley,	McMillan,	Ransom,
Butler,	Gibson,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,
Camden,	Groome,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harris,	Maxey,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Jones of Florida,	Miller of N. Y.,	Williams,
Colquitt,	Kenna,	Mitchell,	Wilson.
Dawes,	Lamar,	Morgan,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the close of section 33:

And under this act no security given or payment made shall be deemed an unlawful preference if it be for no greater part of the debtor's estate than would be the share of the creditor receiving such payment or security, if the said estate were then divided equally among all the creditors.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I thought that was rejected by the Senate the other day by a very large vote, in substance; but I do not wish to discuss it further than to say that if the creditor does what is mentioned in the amendment, not intending to prefer, the bill does not affect him now; but if a man is only able to pay 90 cents on the dollar, and pays that and no more to one creditor, intending to cheat all the rest, he would be allowed to do it by this amendment. The intent to prefer, not the question how much the creditor gets, is the point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COCKRELL (when his name was called). The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has been called out of the Senate Chamber for a few moments and I have paired with him. If he were present, I would vote "yea" and he would vote "nay" on this amendment.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMDEN. I desire to repeat the announcement of my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL].

The result was announced—yeas 9, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—9.

Call,	Hampton,	Vance,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Slater,	Van Wyck,	Williams.
George,

NAYS—36.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Hill,	Morrill,

Colquitt,	Groome,	Logan,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Harrison,	Manderson,	Sewell,
Cullom,	Hawley,	Miller of Cal.,	Sherman.

ABSENT—31.

Anthony,	Fair,	McMillan,	Ransom,

Cameron of Pa.,	Kenna,	Mitchell,	Walker,
Cockrell,	Lamar,	Morgan,	Wilson.
Dawes,	Lapham,	Pendleton,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. I offer the following amendment in section 35, line 6, after the word "thereafter," to insert:

But no such order shall be made until the petitioners shall have given bond, in a sufficient penalty, with good sureties to be approved by the judge, conditioned to pay and satisfy all such damages which the defendant may suffer by reason of such order and proceedings, if the same be not sustained, and also to pay and satisfy all costs that may be recovered against the petitioners. And reasonable counsel fees shall be included in such damages; and, if it appear that such proceedings were commenced without probable cause, or maliciously, or in consequence of the failure or refusal of the debtor to give the petitioners, or any one or more of them, a preference, then exemplary damages may be recovered. And in all cases where the damages assessed, together with the cost, exceed the penalty of the bond judgment shall be entered on the bond to the amount of the penalty, and also against the petitioners for the excess.

Mr. HOAR. That was voted down the other day in substance, and the bill provides amply for the creditors.

Mr. GEORGE. It was only voted down by one vote, 19 to 20, and there are some additional provisions put in which I thought would commend the proposition to the Senate, especially that part of it which subjects the party to exemplary damages in case he brings suit maliciously or without probable cause, or because he has been refused in a demand made for a preference.

Mr. HOAR. It changes the law as to the measure of damages and puts upon a person prosecuting one legal remedy that is not put upon him in any other.

Mr. GEORGE. I can not hear the Senator from Massachusetts. Will he speak louder?

Mr. HOAR. I have got through, sir. What I said was that this changed the law as to the measure of damages into a law which does not exist in many of the States in any case whatever. There is no such thing as vindictive damages in our State and in many others. It puts a burden on a person prosecuting one legal remedy which is not put upon him in any other. I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, six Senators only rising to second the call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. I call for a division.

The question being put, the ayes were 7.

Mr. GEORGE. I give it up; I do not insist on the other side being counted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is disagreed to.

Mr. FARLEY. I offer an amendment to the bill. Section 107, I understand, has been stricken out in committee, and I wish this to come in at the end of the bill in the place of section 107 that has been stricken out:

SEC.—. Proceedings commenced before the passage of this act under any State insolvent laws shall not be impaired or affected hereby.

Mr. HOAR. I hope that amendment will be adopted. I think the bill secures that now sufficiently, but the Senator from California having some doubt about it, it should be made perfectly clear.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK. In section 19, I move to amend by striking out on line 13, after the word "year," to the close of that section. Not having followed the discussion closely——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported for the information of the Senate, after which the Senator will be recognized.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is in section 19, line 13, after the word "year," to strike out the following words:

And, in addition thereto, a reasonable allowance for their necessary office-rent, clerk-hire, and office and traveling expenses, or some part thereof, when such court is of opinion that such allowance is necessary to afford to such commissioner a reasonable compensation for his services and expenses.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I think the Senator from Massachusetts will see the importance of the amendment. I have not followed quite closely the discussion of this bill, and therefore I am at a loss to know whether there has been any suitable explanation by the Senator from Massachusetts or the friends of the bill as to the difference between this bill and the bankrupt law which was repealed only a few years ago. That bankrupt law became so obnoxious, it was so vile in the estimation of the American people, that all classes rose up and demanded that it should be repealed, and Congress yielded to the universal demand of the American people that that law should be repealed. Now comes another bankrupt law, and the people will naturally ask wherein this bankrupt law is preferable or wherein it is not obnoxious to the same criticisms which called for the repeal of the former. The machinery certainly is nearly as cumbersome. The army of office-holders created is equally as numerous. I fail to discover but one difference, and that is that the fees and salaries which are provided for by this bill are to be taken directly from the Treasury of the United States, and therefore, probably, it is supposed that the people will not so readily feel and comprehend the features of the bill when the money is taken directly from the Treasury of the United States.

It is a notorious fact, I apprehend, that in nearly all the estates that were administered under the bankrupt law which was repealed very little found its way into the pockets of the creditors. It would evidently be so under this law, except for the fact I have stated, that the salaries and traveling expenses and clerk-hire and office-rent are to be taken directly from the Treasury of the United States.

I see further that it is provided in this bill that the commissioners who may be appointed, one for each Congressional district—and, undoubtedly, will if the bill passes—shall be lawyers. Then it is provided that their salary shall be $2,000 per year. Then there may be a further allowance not exceeding $10 for each case instituted before them during the year, and then comes a remarkable proposition:

In addition thereto, a reasonable allowance for their necessary office-rent, clerk-hire, and office and traveling expenses, or some part thereof, when such court is of opinion—that such allowance is necessary to afford to such commissioner a reasonable compensation for his services and expenses.

What?

I supposed this bill had provided a reasonable compensation for his services when it fixed his salary at $2,000 a year, but it authorizes the court in its liberality to over three hundred commissioners to make allowance for the purpose of making a reasonable compensation for each commissioner's services and expenses. I submit to the Senator from Massachusetts and the friends of the bill that that is a dangerous power. It authorizes the court in each case to fix the salary of the commissioner and his allowance for clerk-hire and office-rent. It requires that a man shall be a lawyer to be a commissioner, and then the bill allows office-rent. If he is a lawyer it is to be supposed he has an office of his own. Every lawyer is supposed to have an office, which he provides himself; but this bill says that his office-rent and his clerk-hire may be paid at the discretion of the court out of the Treasury of the United States.

It will undoubtedly be the case that the expenses of executing this law by this liberal provision for the compensation of the officers and the authority to the court to increase it will be such that the machinery of this law if not as cumbersome is equally as expensive as the one which was repealed at the unanimous demand of the American people.

Mr. HOAR. If I can have the attention of the Senate for a moment, I will reply to the Senator from Nebraska and I think he will himself be satisfied. The object of the framers of this bill was to press down the cost of these proceedings to the lowest possible limit. I showed in some remarks which I made last year that the saving in the State of Massachusetts alone, by tables which I will not undertake to repeat now, would be at least $50,000 annually, and probably very much more. The only attack which has been made on this bill or any part of it from any quarter has been that we got the expenses so low that we could not get decent and competent lawyers to fill the office. That is the only criticism which I have heard. A gentleman standing high in connection with the New York Board of Trade, and one of the ablest and clearest-headed men who have discussed this question, published an attack on the bill for providing cheap law which would be dear law in the end, but we believe we can accomplish it and that suitable persons can be obtained.

In a full discussion of this general question last week, in the absence of my friend from Nebraska, the Senate overruled the committee in one respect, and authorized an increase of the number of commissioners on the ground stated by the Senator from Kansas and some other Senators, but especially by the Senator from Kansas, that in the large States it would be impossible for one person to perform the duties we put upon him in so large an area of territory. The bill provides that these commissioners shall go into the neighborhood. That is one of the great distinctions between this bill and the old system. The old system took the case to the court, often hundreds and hundreds of miles. This system takes the court to the case. The commissioners have a salary of $2,000 a year only, and then in some particular cases an allowance of $10 a case, but not exceeding $3,000 in all, which will apply to populous cities; but the commissioners are required to go and hold court having reference as near as may be to the places where the probate courts are held, and the State of my friend from Nebraska will have especial interest in that being done, because it is a State large in territory and some parts of it sparsely settled. It is reasonable if the commissioner is to go one hundred or two hundred miles for the convenience of the neighborhood where there are insolvent estates, and has to hire a hall where the witnesses at the hearing can be accommodated, he should have some allowance for it. Not a dollar of it goes into his pocket. It is only such portion of the actual expenses as is required in the opinion of the court to enable him to have enough left of his salary to make him a decent compensation, but he can not exceed his salary. Ordinarily he does not get his office-rent back, but if he has to travel and hire rooms, if the court finds that at the end of the year, after paying all expenses for places to hold courts and traveling expenses and clerks, he has not got enough left of his salary, it may make him a partial allowance. None of these allowances go into his pocket. He is only reimbursed what he has had to pay.

Mr. VAN WYCK. But the bill does not say that his compensation shall not exceed $2,000.

Mr. HOAR. Yes; the limit of the salary is fixed. Then what the man has actually paid out for this service, for the room, may be allowed him in addition, provided that is necessary in the opinion of the court to secure that he gets a reasonable salary. He can not get of course more than the law allows.

Mr. VAN WYCK. But the bill does not say so.

Mr. HOAR. It does as plainly as words can make it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. In the first place it says that he shall have $2,000 a year. Then it provides for $10 a case, and "in addition thereto a reasonable allowance for their necessary office-rent, clerk-hire, and office and traveling expenses." I find "office" in twice; first for "office-rent," where permanently located, and next for "office and traveling expenses" in the case to which the Senator refers where they are off on duty, "or some part thereof, when such court is of opinion that such allowance is necessary to afford to such commissioner a reasonable compensation for his services and expenses." There is nothing in that which limits a commissioner to $2,000.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly the man gets his salary and no more. That is all he is entitled to. Then the court says there shall be paid back to him what he has paid out necessarily in the execution of this service, provided in the opinion of the court paying back to him what he has paid in traveling and office expenses, and so on, is necessary to insure that he has a reasonable compensation; otherwise he has to pay it out of his own pocket and does not get it back; but the man can in no event make more out of this office for his own services than the amount which the bill fixes. I do not see how human language can make it any clearer.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The difficulty is that the language does not say that. The commissioner receives $2,000 a year salary whether he does much or little. That is so, is it not?

Mr. HOAR. That is so.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The commissioner receives $2,000 a year, no matter whether he has one case or ten or a hundred.

Mr. HOAR. The court has got to fix the number of commissioners in each State in reference to the business. It is not obliged to have one for every Representative district. Therefore the presumption is, the certainty is, if we can trust anybody, that we shall not have any more commissioners than are necessary for the business. Therefore there will be but few.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That depends on how many relatives the judge has.

Mr. HOAR. The judge is prohibited from appointing relatives by a statute we have passed.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts does not the bill provide that in addition to $2,000 a year the commissioner shall have $10 a case?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly; that is in the same proviso that was discussed the other day.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The language is plain that the commissioners shall each receive a salary of $2,000 a year, and that a commissioner will have whether he has a single case or not.

Provided further, That the court, both of said justices concurring, appointing them may in any case decree a further allowance not exceeding $10 for each case instituted before them during the year—

That is plain and that is understood. Two thousand dollars he has in salary, and then $10 for each case if the court allows it. Then further—

and in addition thereto—

To what? To the compensation before provided—

in addition thereto, a reasonable allowance for their necessary office-rent, clerk-hire, and office and traveling expenses.

The word "office" is used twice, so as to have it fully understood that it will be one of his duties to have his office expenses paid from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. If this is a mere question about words, I do not see how the English language can make this thing plainer than the bill makes it. The Senator does not understand it so. Suppose he puts in before the words "reasonable allowance" the words "for reimbursement of sums by them actually paid out for their necessary office rent," &c.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It is more than a question of phraseology.

And in addition thereto—

That is, to the $2,000 a year and to the $10 per case which the commissioner has absolutely—

And in addition thereto, a reasonable allowance for their necessary office-rent, clerk-hire, and office and traveling expenses, or some part thereof, when such court is of opinion—

Here is a salary to be fixed by the opinion of a court; you have judges in every State to determine this matter; it is left to their discretion—when such court is of opinion that such allowance is—

Not necessary to reimburse them; that is not the language; but—is necessary to afford to such commissioner a reasonable compensation for his services.

You give the court the power to increase the salary and compensation of the commissioners, over three hundred of them in the United States; and courts are very liberal, as much as Congress is, when the money is to come from the Treasury of the United States and possibly go into the pocket of some friend. Nobody will question the liberality of a court under that clause.

Now, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that is not a mere question of phraseology. You allow the court to do this if it seems in its opinion "necessary to afford to such commissioner a reasonable compensation for his services." That language does not carry out the idea which the Senator says was intended to be carried out by the bill, because it clothed the court with power not to reimburse. If you desire to reimburse him for expenses, say so.

Mr. HOAR. Put that in; I have no objection.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I am suggesting to my friend; he is more familiar with this bill than I am. In my judgment it is bad enough as it is, but it is a little worse when it uses language which will defeat the object the promoters of the bill say they have in view.

Mr. HOAR. I will move to amend that sentence, as I do not wish to be tenacious of my own language. I think it is as clear and compact as it can be, but I will move to insert, after the word "allowance," the words "to reimburse them for sums actually paid out."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to amend the paragraph proposed to be stricken out by inserting, after the word "allowance," the words "to reimburse them for sums actually paid out."

Mr. VAN WYCK. Let me ask the Senator if he will not also consent to strike out the word "office-rent" in the fifth line?

Mr. HOAR. I do not think that would be just.

Mr. VAN WYCK. But these are required to be lawyers who are supposed to have an office. It would not be much of a lawyer in Massachusetts who did not have an office. You have in the bill "office-rent" and then "office and traveling expenses." Why use the word "office" twice if you do not intend that the lawyer shall be paid his office-rent for his law office out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. HOAR. There are cases in my own State, and undoubtedly will be very soon, if there are not now, in nearly all the States in the Union; and I think I was told of a large manufacturing establishment in the State of Mississippi the other day that employed a thousand hands in a very small town indeed, a town where there are only 1,500 inhabitants. I suppose the hands come in from outside the town limits. This bill requires these men to go to the place where the insolvency occurs, as probate courts do to the place where there is a death, to every neighborhood every ten or fifteen miles square, and they have got sometimes to hire an office which will enable three or five hundred people to attend court and prove their claims. They have got to do that three or four times over, and they have got to travel, in some Congressional districts, 100 or 150 miles at a time, when bankruptcy is existing. It may have to be done many times a year. It is not just that these men should have to hire a hall as large as a church, as they would have to do sometimes, out of their own pockets.

Let me repeat that this bill does not give the man himself anything in addition to the salary. It says that when he has to hire an office or to pay for fuel or light or the services of an attendant, or whatever is included under "office expenses," the judge will look into it, and if he sees that the salary is enough to give the man reasonable pay, and he can pay all these things out of his own pocket, he requires him to do it. If he finds the salary is not enough to enable him to do that and pay for all these things out of his own pocket, but he can pay half, then the judge makes a reasonable allowance of some part of what is paid out.

I do not profess to be any better judge of what is just and reasonable, or of expressing in language what is just and reasonable, than my honorable friend from Nebraska; but it seems to me, whatever else in this bill might be doubtful, we have made that thing clear; whatever else in this bill might be of doubtful policy, that thing is just.

Mr. VAN WYCK. There is no doubt the bill makes that clear, but undoubtedly it makes it clear against the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts. The repetition of the word "office" twice means something, I think, and when a court passes upon that it will say it means something. In the first place, the section provides "for their necessary office-rent, clerk-hire, and office and traveling expenses." In the case to which the Senator refers, I can see the force of such an allowance, but that is covered by the term "office and traveling expenses." Why use the word "office" twice in this connection if it is not intended to cover their permanent office-rent when at home, and the office they are compelled to hire when engaged in the discharge of the duty?

Mr. HOAR. Suppose a man at home has to hire a permanent office all the year round?

Mr. VAN WYCK. "Office expenses" would cover that.

Mr. HOAR. "Office expenses" include light, gas, &c.

Mr. VAN WYCK. If this discretion is allowed the Senator will find that the courts will exercise the utmost liberality in allowing for the commissioner's office-rent at home and his office-rent abroad.

Mr. SHERMAN. As I have made up my mind to vote for this bill, I should like to see one danger removed from it, the danger which made the former law unpopular and odious in the last degree, so that in its latter days a case scarcely occurred where any creditor ever got a dividend, great or small. That was the case in our country in my own personal experience. I know the bankruptcy law became odious because it was so much abused in its latter days in the Western States, and that is the reason there was so much feeling expressed here. There was scarcely a case in bankruptcy which paid a dollar to the creditors. That was so in our region.

One reason why the bankruptcy provisions attached to the national banking system have been so beneficial is that the whole system of winding up national banks has been transferred from the local courts to the Comptroller of the Currency, and the result has been that there never has been any question, with one or two exceptions, of which I suppose a bank in Boston was one, where there was any controversy about settling up the affairs of a bank, but generally all the assets have been fairly applied without much reduction on account of expenses.

In this very section to which the Senator from Nebraska calls attention it seems to me a faulty principle is maintained, and if that could be corrected by the Senator from Massachusetts who has the bill in charge, and who no doubt is impatient at the long delay about it, I believe it would strengthen this bill in popular opinion, strengthen it in the Senate, and in practice it would make it more efficient and less destructive of the unfortunate creditor who has to pay, after all, out of the assets of the debtor the expenses of this proceeding in bankruptcy.

Mr. HOAR. My friend will pardon me; the debtor pays $60 into the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know what effect that may have upon him, but the creditor has in the end to pay for it. If the Government of the United States is to pay these expenses out of funds made up in this way, then more than ever I say there ought to be put into this bill, there ought to be ingrafted in it, a provision to bring the expenses of bankruptcy under the surveillance and control of executive officers of the Government. I would not trust a court in fixing the compensation of a lawyer, nor would I allow a court to fix the compensation and expenses, the office-rent and fees of a man appointed by the judge, perhaps his brother or his intimate friend, always a person connected with him by some social or friendly or political tie.

What I would think better—I do not suppose my friend would agree to it—would be to strike out "circuit judge" in line 8, and require these expenses to be examined in detail and approved by the accounting officers of the Treasury. That is the same surveillance to which all the other expenditures of the Government are subjected. Even the expenses of the courts are subjected to the surveillance of the accounting officers of the Government; but this bill makes the approval of the circuit judge, the examination by the circuit judge of the details rendered to the circuit judge, final and conclusive; and all the Treasury can do is to pay the money out of this fund. It seems to me that there can be no reasonable objection to taking out "circuit judge" and letting these accounts come here to be examined by general rules and regulations fair to all alike. Why should it not be done? Again:

That the court, both of said justices concurring, appointing them may in any case decree a further allowance, not exceeding $10 for each case instituted before them during the year, and, in addition thereto, a reasonable allowance for their necessary office-rent, clerk-hire, and office and traveling expenses, or some part thereof, when such court is of opinion that such allowance is necessary.

If I had my way in drawing that section I would say that the First Comptroller under general rules prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury may in any case decree a further allowance not exceeding $10, &c., transferring these whole allowances which are on paper, the nature of which may be supported by affidavit, to be passed upon by the proper officers of the Treasury Department. It may be said that I desire in this way to add to the business of that great Department. On the contrary, from the nature of things that Department is the natural custodian and guardian over the Treasury, and as this now has become a matter of national expenditure, to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, so stated in the beginning of this section, it ought to be brought under the surveillance of the proper officers of the Government. All these items of account should not be left to a friendly judge; they ought not to be left to local influences; they ought not to be left to be influenced by the social and political relations between these commissioners and the supervisor and the judge or court that appoints them. They ought to be transferred to an independent tribunal subject to the control of Congress. If it turns out that the Treasury officers do not make fair allowances, Congress is always ready to make corrections.

I do not want to embarrass my friend from Massachusetts; but I do believe that these are good amendments that ought be ingrafted on this bill. I shall vote for them any way, because I wish to try the experiment of another bankrupt law, and I hope it will have a better issue than the last bankrupt law had. I believe that this single provision alone would save it from much of the danger of the old bankrupt law.

Mr. HOAR. My honorable friend from Ohio, for whose judgment I have, as he knows, the profoundest respect, certainly has not in the multitude of his avocations had full opportunity to fully understand the scheme of the bill in this particular. If he will allow me to explain it to him, I think he will agree with me.

We provided in the bill which was substituted for another reported last winter to pay $4,000 a year salary to the commissioners and $6,000 a year to the inspectors, and then the bankrupt's estates were each to pay in one fee of $50 and one of $10 and 1 per cent. of the assets into the Treasury; and we demonstrated very clearly that even with these large salaries there would be a large profit to the Treasury of the United States in the whole administration of the bankrupts' estates, and in the next place that there would be a large saving, as compared with the old fee system, to the creditors among whom the insolvent estates are to be divided. If that be true, this year we have made it still stronger by cutting down the commissioners' salaries to $2,000 a year and the inspectors' or supervisors' to $3,000; so that with half the expense the profit is to be still larger. We were at once attacked by the very able man in New York to whom I alluded just now; we received letters from all over the country saying, "You can not get the legal service, you can not get men of weight and legal learning, because the cases that come up in the administration of bankruptcy, especially between individual and partnership creditors, are among the profoundest and most subtle questions which arise in law; you can not get the legal capacity, or learning, or fidelity, or weight of character which is necessary to make this administration a success at that price."

The Senate the other day went beyond the committee's recommendation in one respect by giving opportunity for a larger number of commissioners. Instead of having only a number equal to one-half the number of Representatives in Congress, the Senate said the judges might go beyond that. We said in addition to that that instead of raising the salary if the judge found the commissioner's time was so taken up in the multitude of cases that $2,000 a year would not pay him for the service, he might add not exceeding $10 a case, which would not ordinarily amount to an additional $1,000 a year, because a man is hardly supposed to be able to manage a hundred cases in a year. The judge may do that, and then he may allow, if a man was required to travel great distances, what he actually pays out of his own pocket for hiring a room to hold court in, &c., besides.

That allowance must be concurred in by two judges, the judge of the United States circuit court and the judge of the district court. We have passed a bill at this session declaring that a judge shall not appoint any relative to any office under his power. Those making this allowance must have spread before them the whole records of the bankruptcy court. The making of a copy to be sent to the Treasury would cost as much as the Treasury would save by any possible superior economy in that office. How impossible it is for the First Comptroller of the Treasury to determine whether the commissioner in a particular district in Oregon or Massachusetts or Maryland, even close to the Treasury, has so much labor, so much to do, so many meetings, and so many important questions that he can say whether the amount of his salary ought to be diminished by the amount charged for office-rent.

This is not—and that is an answer to what the Senator from Nebraska said—a question of increasing a man's salary from the Treasury. It is a question whether he shall be compelled to diminish it by paying the expenses of his court-house from his own pocket. The bill says that if the judge is of opinion that the commissioner's salary does not more than pay him enough, then instead of requiring him to diminish it by paying for warming and lighting and hiring a room, that shall be allowed from the Treasury.

As I said, it is utterly impossible for any official in the Treasury Department to deal with that question. He may not be a lawyer; and if he is he may not be a bankruptcy lawyer; and if he is a bankruptcy lawyer he can not possibly know what this officer does; whereas the judges have each case before them; every step in the case is subject to revision by the judges; they are familiar with the business of the district and with the exigencies of the particular case.

I think my intelligent friend from Ohio will see that his criticism is one which undoubtedly is the result of a very large experience, and undoubtedly will be found correct as applicable to almost all Government expenditures, but is totally inapplicable to the system which this bill creates.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts no doubt thinks he has fairly answered my objection; but I do not think so. He says that the First Comptroller can not do this, and that as a matter of course the First Comptroller can not pass upon all the various items embraced in these various accounts in the different bankruptcy courts in the United States. But the First Comptroller is at the head of a bureau containing two or three hundred trained and experienced men, whose whole business and study in life, whose whole occupation is to examine accounts. They have the material; they have the number of cases, &c. They must go by some certain rules.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask my honorable friend if he proposes to have the records of all the courts of bankruptcy in this country sent to the Treasury?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; and I do not suppose that the judges in passing on these items of account rendered from time to time by the commissioners and supervisors will have the records before them.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly they will be required to have the records before them. They are the official records in the cases.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the contrary, a judge in Ohio will fix one rule by which he will govern himself in making this allowance; in the State of New York it will be another rule; in the State of Mississippi it will be another rule, and so on. You will have as many laws of fees and allowances in these cases as there are States and courts in the Union. You will have no general system. You will have the compensation fixed practically at the discretion of your judges. When you fix the salary at $3,000 for supervisors and $2,000 for commissioners you do not fix the total expenses. In all human probability the other expenses allowed to these officers will be equal to the amount of salary, and that is regulated not by any general rule, not by any rule prescribed or under the control of a single executive officer, but by the decision of one hundred separate courts in the United States.

Remember, the courts of the United States are not organized to pass upon accounts. You would not send an account to a lawyer to examine items and add up and say that it was correctly stated; you would send it to a man engaged in business. Of all the people in the world I have come across the most improvident men in the management of accounts merely, in the statement of accounts, are lawyers. Lawyers deal with other classes of subjects; they do not deal with accounts; and especially to select a lawyer or a judge who is himself interested to some extent in the conduct and character and qualifications of the commissioners and supervisors, is to select an interested party, a man who has already prejudged in favor of the man who renders the account.

Remember that the old system is changed. This money does not come out of the bankrupt estates now; it comes out of the Treasury of the United States, and these are orders upon the Treasury. When the judge underwrites this account it is an order on the Treasury, and whether it be excessive or not according to the opinion of the Treasury officers here it must be paid, because the law makes the decision of the judge final. No man can feel hurt when his accounts are passed upon by the same officer under general rules prescribed by a Department absolutely independent in all this business. No man can feel hurt when he is not allowed an unreasonable office-rent. How is this done in the Post-Office Department? We have 100,000 postmasters; perhaps I overstate the number of postmasters. How many are there in the country now?

Mr. INGALLS. More than 100,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I state it in round numbers. All their accounts pass under the control and government of certain rules. They all have to be examined by the Postmaster-General in the first instance and afterward by the Sixth Auditor, who passes upon their accounts finally. How is it done there? They are infinitely greater in number than the accounts of the bankrupts' estates would be. We can not expect a hundred thousand bankrupts to be in process of liquidation at any time. That would be fearful if it should be so. Probably there would not be one-tenth of that.

Mr. HOAR. May I trespass on the indulgence of my friend from Ohio? A member of the Senate, now in the chair [Mr. EDMUNDS], has drawn a sentence which seems to me probably will meet the objection of the Senator from Ohio, and to which I shall not object. I think on the whole it would be as clear as my own language, perhaps clearer than my own; and if he will allow this to be read for his information perhaps it will meet his view.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall be very glad. All I want is to have these accounts brought under the same surveillance as all other accounts against the Government of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Let that be read for the information of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will read the suggestion, being more familiar with the handwriting. The proposition is to strike out all after the word "year," in line 13, and insert:

But not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of $3,000, and the commissioners may be allowed a reasonable sum for their actual and necessary disbursements for temporary office-rent elsewhere than at the place of their general office, for clerk-hire, traveling and incidental expenses. All such allowances shall be passed upon by the court and reviewed and settled in the Treasury Department in the same manner now provided by law in the case of the accounts of district attorneys and marshals.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think if the Chair would add "under regulations to be prescribed by the Treasury Department," that would do.

Mr. HOAR. There is no objection to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think there should be a general regulation fixing the different allowances, just as in the case of postmasters.

Mr. ALLISON. I have the statute here to which the proposition refers, which I think regulates the matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. Please read it.

Mr. ALLISON. The following is the provision contained in section 846 of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 846. The accounts of district attorneys, clerks, marshals, and commissioners of circuit courts shall be examined and certified by the district judge of the district for which they are appointed before they are presented to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department for settlement. They shall then be subject to revision upon their merits by said accounting officers, as in case of other public accounts.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is all I desire.

Mr. ALLISON. I think that provision covers it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the manner now provided by law, with a law of later date of still more stringent character.

Mr. SHERMAN. My impression is that express power ought always to be given to the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe rules and regulations fixing the general amount of these allowances, fixing the amount of office-rent, the maximum if you please. In other words, to do just exactly what the Postmaster-General does in his regulations fixing the extra expenses allowed to the different postmasters under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Treasury Department. I am not sure but that is already covered by existing laws, but it would be better to insert it perhaps.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the paragraph moved to be stricken out by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the machinery of this bill, however economically it may be administered, will be very expensive. Of course it is not possible to make an accurate computation as to what annual expenditure will be required, but I assume that not less than two hundred and fifty commissioners will be appointed. It is not usual to have any places that can be filled for a long time empty when the demands are as active and as vigilant as they usually are. Of course there are some limitations imposed upon the aggregate that may be appointed; that is to say, States having a less number of Representatives than six are only entitled to commissioners to the amount of two-thirds of their representation in Congress; but it is fair to assume that there will be at least two hundred and fifty commissioners appointed at once. The entire number of supervisors of course will be immediately appointed. That will involve an appropriation for permanent official salaries, in addition to those now paid by the United States Government, of not less than $750,000 or $800,000, and that entirely irrespective of the amount of business to be done.

The Senator from Massachusetts has assured us that it is the design and expectation of the framers of this bill that it will be what is commonly called self-supporting; that the amount of money paid out in the outset of the proceedings and the percentage that is proposed upon the assets will form a fund sufficient to meet the demands that may be made upon the Treasury for the payment of the official salaries.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] asks me if all these fees and payments go into the Treasury. So I understand. They are paid into the Treasury of the United States and then the salaries and the other expenses are paid directly out of the Treasury of the United States. So that whether there is one dollar paid in by those proposing to take the bankruptcy proceedings or not, the entire official salaries and expenditures must be paid out of the Treasury.

The clauses to which attention has been called are always the dangerous clauses in all bills of this kind. They are the indefinite and elastic elements in the computation. I may say, I presume without contradiction, that of all the scandals and all the disagreeable features that have occurred in connection with expenditures, the great mass of them have arisen under these indefinite and elastic clauses which allow appropriations to be made and payments to be made for expenses and for such sums as the judges and other persons may deem reasonable as compensation to salaried officers.

I believe, Mr. President, that the whole system of allowing extra compensation by way of expenses to be audited by the judges or by the other officers is entirely vicious, that it ought not to be permitted. We do not pay the judges compensation in addition to their salaries. Other officers of the Government are not paid in addition to their salaries. You pay traveling expenses when they are called upon to go outside their districts, but you do not pay the circuit judge of the eighth circuit, for instance, who travels over a space of country as large as the half of Europe, one cent for traveling expenses. He gets a salary of $6,000, I believe, and I am informed that that amount is reduced by his traveling expenses and hotel bills sometimes as much as $2,500 a year.

The salaries here ought to be large enough to enable a man to hold the office and pay his own expenses, and I do not think that the amendment which the Senator from Massachusetts has offered will cure the difficulty. I have no doubt that if this is allowed, under this expensive process that always goes on without any responsibility, without any feeling of official responsibility to the Treasury, under the appeals that are made by men who claim that they are hard worked, that they have had great distances to travel, that they have had a great deal of business to do, the amount which will be required to make this bill effectual will be a million dollars a year promptly.

I should like very much if the Senator could see his way clear, if the salaries are not large enough to make them larger so that the officer holding the office may understand at the outset that he has to discharge the duties of the office and to pay his own expenses the same as the district judge does, the same as the circuit judge does, the same as all other judicial officers do unless when they are called upon as district judges to perform duties outside of their districts.

Before I close, Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether the salaries of these commissioners should not be payable quarterly from the Treasury the same as those of the supervisors. I observe that the supervisors are to be paid $3,000 a year, quarterly from the Treasury as judges are now paid, while the commissioners who receive a lower compensation are to receive an annual salary of $2,000. I suppose that omission was unintentional, and I move an amendment that the salary be payable quarterly from the Treasury.

Mr. HOAR. Is there not a general law that all salaries are paid quarterly?

Mr. ALLISON. The salaries of the judges are now paid monthly.

Mr. VAN WYCK. There is not only this provision, which has been explained by the Senator from Massachusetts as being owing to his desire to fully protect and indemnify and sustain this class of office-holders, but in that connection I should like to refer to section 75, page 48, line 12, to show that the anxiety and solicitude for this class of officers runs through the bill even to the end. This bill requires that in certain cases the commissioners shall act instead of trustees; and in section 75 it is provided that the trustees shall be limited in their charges to "not exceeding the rate of compensation allowed for similar services by the probate courts of the State." And yet in the twelfth line, when it speaks of the acts of the commissioners where they are required to act as trustees, it is provided:

Where the commissioner acts as trustee the allowance shall be made by the judge.

There is no restriction there; I think the Senator from Massachusetts will agree with me. "Where the commissioner acts as trustee the allowance shall be made by the judge," with no restriction upon him at all.

Mr. HOAR. I do not so understand the bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. This is not a question of phraseology any more than the other was, because here it is perfectly plain that where the commissioner acts as trustee the allowance shall be made by the judge. That is, after you have given him $2,000 a year you put him under the kind guardianship of the judge who appointed him, whose friend he is, and then you still further extend your bounty and give him more pay, more compensation for his services in these cases where he is required by the bill to act as trustee, because there he is to receive such allowance as the judge shall make. I call attention to that so that we shall not have to do it later, and so that the amendment which may be agreed upon may cover all these cases.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] with his large experience of the Treasury Department evidently sees the danger not only of allowing a discretionary power to the judge, but from the want of restrictions on the accounting officers. You have accounting officers in the Treasury Department to-day, and yet bills go through, as in the case of the star-route special counsel, and your accounting officers have been sitting there as clerks to record what they have been directed to enter; that is all.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. The bill now provides that in ordinary cases a trustee shall be appointed and the limit on his charges is made which the Senator has referred to; that is, the trustee's charges are to be on the same scale as the charges in the State probate courts. It is provided that when there is some little estate where it is not necessary to have the expense of a trustee the commissioner may himself act as trustee; and of course there must be somebody to pass on his accounts. You would not have them fixed by himself, while he would in ordinary cases of trustees pass upon the trustees' accounts. Therefore it says that the judge shall determine the account in a case where the commissioner acts as trustee. He is certainly the proper person to determine it on the same principle that costs are ordinarily determined. The provisions in the bill as to the standard applies to all trustees' charges, whether the trustee is the commissioner or not.

Mr. VAN WYCK. But the difficulty is, as in the other case, that the bill does not say so. The language does not lead to that inference, and you leave it as a matter of inference to the court, and in its generosity the court may say, "You do not fix it, and we will allow what we please; you make a limit on the trustee appointed by the creditors, but when the commissioner acts as trustee the allowance shall be made by the judge, not to be governed by the same principles as stated in the former part of the section; it is silent as to that." It is merely left to the discretion of the judge where the commissioner acts as trustee. I submit that in that case, as in the other, the language should be made specific."

In order that this matter may be placed right while we are discussing this question as to the necessity of protecting the Treasury not only against judges and commissioners and clerks, I may allude to the fact that our court clerks now are paid by fees, and they receive in many cases fees far in excess of the compensation the law allows them; and yet will you some time take occasion to run over the reports and see how much of the excess of fees received by the clerks of the courts finds its way into the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. COCKRELL. Has any of it gone there?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Very little; and I refer my friend to Kansas City, in his own State, where the clerk of the court receives a large amount of fees in excess of the compensation which the law allows him, and yet nearly all of it is spent there in extra clerk-hire or in enormous bills for furniture, and those things are approved by your judge. What protection is there to the Treasury or to the people? What exists in Kansas City, in the State of my friend from Missouri, exists in other States of this Union—in every other State probably. You supposed you were protecting the Treasury and protecting the people when you fixed the salary or compensation of your clerks and required the excess to be paid into the Treasury; but the court stands there between the clerk and the Treasury of the United States, and takes the money collected by the clerks, which the law says they shall turn into the Treasury, and puts it substantially into their own pockets.

The Senator from Kansas says you have a bill which will cost you millions of dollars in its execution. You say the bill is self-sustaining. The bankrupts are required to pay $50 to the clerk and then 1 per cent. on the assets, and that is to make the system self-sustaining! The other bankruptcy bill claimed to be self-sustaining when the officers got all the property of the debtors and none of the cash went into the pockets of the creditors. All the property was absorbed by the officers. If this bill passes into a law, and comes to be executed, it will be the same, only a little worse in that respect, because of course men sometimes have a little sympathy with the creditor or even with the debtor. That may be sometimes in hard cases; but when you find a court that will have any sympathy as between a pet, a friendly appointment, and the Treasury of the United States, the Senator will be able to put it down. More dangerous is this bill, far more dangerous, than the bankruptcy bill which was so obnoxious to the people that they demanded its repeal. Here it is at the discretion of the court to say what shall be a reasonable compensation, when it should be the business of Congress to fix a sum in the bill that the courts may have no opportunity by prejudice or favor to affect the compensation of the officers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer this, which I think will accomplish the purpose——

Mr. HOAR. I will modify my amendment as suggested by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. In section 19, lines 4 and 5, I move to strike out the words "They shall also, in like manner, be reimbursed from the Treasury for their necessary office-rent, clerk-hire, and office and traveling expenses," and then insert the language prepared and read, which covers that and the clause below.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Massachusetts to withdraw the amendment he offered to perfect the paragraph and move to amend the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let there be two amendments.

The SECRETARY. It is moved to strike out all after the word "year," in line 13 of section 19, and to insert:

But not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of $3,000. And said supervisors and commissioners may be allowed a reasonable sum for their actual and necessary disbursements for temporary office-rent elsewhere than at the place of their general office, for clerk-hire, traveling, and incidental expenses, all which allowances shall be passed upon by the court and reviewed and settled in the Treasury Department in the same manner now provided by law in the case of the accounts of district attorneys and marshals, under general rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. INGALLS. The proviso contained in lines 6, 7, and 8 of the section should also be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be a secondary question. The Chair can only put the question now on this amendment.

Mr. HOAR. That will have to be done.

Mr. GEORGE. Can I call for a division of the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. I want to strike out, but I do not want to vote to insert.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is open to division.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I call for a division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present motion is not capable of division. That is a motion to amend an amendment. If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio be agreed to, then it will be subject to division, the Chair thinks.

Mr. GEORGF. Then I shall get a vote on striking the whole of it out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us hear what that is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi asks for a division of this question. The question will be first put on striking out all after the word "year" in line 13 of section 19.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That branch of the amendment being agreed to, the question now is on agreeing to the second branch of the amendment to insert the words proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Now how does the clause stand?

Mr. SHERMAN. To carry out the amendment, the words in lines 4, 5, and 6 should be stricken out.

Mr. INGALLS. And in 7 and 8, because that is merely an appendage to the declaration in lines 4, 5, and 6.

Mr. SHERMAN. They might be stricken out.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly they must be stricken out; they have no significance there—

Provided, That the items thereof shall be verified upon oath, and shall be examined in detail and approved by the circuit judge.

If lines 4, 5, and 6 are stricken out, that proviso has no place.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the proviso ought to be inserted at the end of the new provision.

Mr. INGALLS. It ought to be stricken out and inserted somewhere else. It does not belong there.

Mr. SHERMAN. The words in lines 4, 5, and 6 should be stricken out, and the proviso that follows should be inserted at the end of the clause adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to strike out the words which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out:

They shall also, in like manner, be reimbursed from the Treasury for their necessary office-rent, clerk-hire, and office and traveling expenses.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then transfer the proviso, "Provided, That the items thereof shall be verified upon oath," to the end of the section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now will be on striking out the clause just read.

Mr. INGALLS. Does that include lines 4 to 8, inclusive?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does as now modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I move that the proviso be inserted at the end of the section.

Mr. INGALLS. Now let it all be read as it will be if that amendment is agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to amend the section by adding thereto:

Provided, That the items thereof shall be verified upon oath, and shall be examined in detail and approved by the circuit judge.

Mr. INGALLS. Now let us have the clause read as it will be if that amendment is agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment agreed to at the end of the section will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The commissioners shall each receive an annual salary of $2,000: Provided further, That the court, both of said justices concurring, appointing them may in any case decree a further allowance, not exceeding $10 for each case instituted before them during the year, but not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of $3,000. And said supervisors and commissioners may be allowed a reasonable sum for their actual and necessary disbursements for temporary office-rent elsewhere than at the place of their general office, for clerk-hire, traveling and incidental expenses, all which allowances shall be passed upon by the court, and reviewed and settled in the Treasury Department in the same manner now provided by law in the case of the accounts of district attorneys and marshals, under general rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided further, That the items thereof shall be verified upon oath, and shall be examined in detail and approved by the circuit judge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. INGALLS. It is inconsistent and entirely superfluous, it appears to me.

Mr. SHERMAN. The words "approved by the circuit judge" are already sufficiently in before. The requirement that items shall be verified by oath is not in the previous clause.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio modify his amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to insert "the items to be verified by oath" in the body of the new amendment. That is all that is necessary to preserve of that clause.

Mr. HOAR. There will be no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to amend as will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "expenses," in the amendment, it is proposed to insert:

The items of which shall be verified by oath.

So as to read:

But not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of $3,000. And said supervisors and commissioners may be allowed a reasonable sum for their actual and necessary disbursements for temporary office-rent elsewhere than at the place of their general office, for clerk-hire, traveling and incidental expenses, the items of which shall be verified by oath; all of which allowances shall be passed upon by the court and reviewed and settled in the Treasury Department in the same manner now provided by law in the case of the accounts of district attorneys and marshals, under general rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. INGALLS. Now, if I understood the language of the first three lines there correctly, the aggregate to be derived from this payment of $10 in each case is not to exceed $3,000 a year. I suppose the intention is to have the aggregate compensation reach $3,000. If that is the case the "three" ought to be changed to "one," as I understand, in the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Ohio to insert the clause "all such items shall be verified by oath."

Mr. INGALLS. That is agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not yet; the question is on that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Now I should like to hear the first three lines read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first three lines will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That the court, both of said justices concurring, appointing them may in any case decree a further allowance, not exceeding $10 for each case instituted before them during the year, but not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of $3,000.

Mr. INGALLS. That should be $1,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. That ought to be $1,000, unless you say "including the salary."

Mr. INGALLS. But the language now is that this aggregate allowance of $10 in each case shall not exceed $3,000, which would increase the salary to $5,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has been agreed to. Does the Senator from Kansas move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to?

Mr. HOAR. Make the change by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to modifying the amendment which has been agreed to by inserting the word "one" in place of the word "three," so as to read, "not exceeding $1,000?" The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is made.

Mr. INGALLS. Now, after the word "dollars," in line 10, I move to insert "payable quarterly from the Treasury."

Mr. HOAR. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Now, after the word "Treasury," in line 3, I move to strike out the words "as judges are now paid," it being somewhat a matter of doubt whether they are payable quarterly or monthly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. At the close of section 18 I move to add:

No person shall be eligible as a supervisor unless a practicing attorney of the courts of the United States or of one of the States or Territories.

Mr. COCKRELL. Would the Senator accept as an amendment "of the State or Territory wherein appointed?"

Mr. HOAR. You do not want "of the Territory" if the Senator means by "practicing attorney" one having other business than this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. While the Senator from Kansas is perfecting his amendment the Chair will call attention to the use of the word "further" in line 10 of section 19, after the word "provided." The word "further" should be stricken out so as to read "provided." If there be no objection that word will be stricken out.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Massachusetts criticises the language of the amendment I suggested. I will call his attention to the language employed in the bill. On page 8, section 12, lines 19, 20, and 21, is this provision:

No person shall be eligible as a commissioner unless a practicing attorney of the courts of the United States or of one of the States or Territories.

I suppose the intention is that the supervisors should be also members of the bar.

Mr. HOAR. That is true.

Mr. INGALLS. But that is omitted.

Mr. HOAR. There is no objection to it. The supervisor is expected to employ his whole time, and the commissioner may not in all cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the following amendment to come in as an additional section——

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator to yield to me, as we are on section 18.

Mr. MORGAN. Let my amendment be first reported, and then I will.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert as an additional section:

SEC. —. In the appointment of officers of every class under the provisions of this act the appointing power shall be exercised alone with reference to the personal fitness of the individual for the discharge of the duties of the office, and no discrimination shall be made in favor of or against any person in making such appointments in consequence of the political opinions or party associations of such person; and no judge shall appoint any person to office under this act who holds any other office of profit or emolument under the laws of any State or under the laws of the United States; nor shall any judge appoint any person to any office under this act who is related by consanguinity or affinity within the third degree to any judge of the circuit or district courts of the circuit in which such officer shall be appointed.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Alabama if he considers the office of justice of the peace an office of emolument or profit? All our judges are justices of the peace throughout our Commonwealth; and it would be that for convenience in certifying papers a man might be a justice of the peace——

Mr. MORGAN. They are justices of the peace ex officio, and not by separate appointments.

Mr. FRYE. Every lawyer in my State is a justice of the peace by appointment.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose every member of this body is a justice of the peace in the State to which he belongs probably, or nearly so.

Mr. MORGAN. I never knew that I enjoyed such an honor as that, and I have been at the bar many years.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator will modify his amendment so as not to include justices of the peace.

Mr. MORGAN. If there is any peculiarity in the Northern States by which all lawyers are justices of the peace I must make that exception. I did not intend to include that distinguished position universally.

Mr. HALE. In some of the Northern States the judges in looking over men suitable for these appointments would hardly find a member of the bar, perhaps not a single one, who was not a justice of the peace.

Mr. HOAR. Put in "except justices of the peace."

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly. I had no idea of including them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama modifies his amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. "Except justices of the peace and notaries public."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is modified by inserting after the word "States"—

Excepting justices of the peace and notaries public.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask the Senator from Alabama to add to that exception commissioners of deeds and masters in chancery.

Mr. MORGAN. Are they officers?

Mr. SEWELL. They are officers in my State with small emoluments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama modify his amendment?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; I further modify it by adding "excepting justices of the peace, notaries public, commissioners of deeds, and masters in chancery."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the provision which makes the attorney of the United States in each Territory and in the District of Columbia the supervisor therein. Is it intended to increase the compensation allowed them for acting as supervisors?

Mr. HOAR. It is part of their official duty.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I call the Senator's attention to section 18, which provides—

That supervisors duly appointed and acting under this act shall receive yearly salaries, &c.

It seems to me unless there is some restriction there the district attorneys in the District of Columbia and in the Territories will make a claim at least for compensation.

Mr. HOAR. Put in the words "duly appointed and acting in any State under this act." That will exclude the Territories and the District of Columbia.

Mr. INGALLS. Why not say "without additional compensation" after "therein?"

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me, to make it perfectly clear, there should be an exception like that suggested by the Senator from Kansas, "without additional compensation."

Mr. HOAR. Let that be added.

Mr. ALLISON. After "therein" say "without additional compensation."

Mr. SHERMAN. "Without compensation additional to their regular salary."

Mr. ALLISON. "Without compensation additional to that authorized by law."

Mr. INGALLS. Do you not intend to pay them their necessary office-rent, clerk-hire, and traveling expenses incurred in carrying out the provisions of the law?

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me that we ought to exclude the attorney of the District of Columbia certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I think we can do it without any addition. It is a compact territory.

Mr. ALLISON. So I think; and therefore I ask the Senator to interpolate such words here as will make that perfectly clear.

Mr. HOAR. That was the intention of the bill. I do not object at all to the insertion, but I do not think it is important to provide that they shall have extra office-rent or anything of that kind. There will not ordinarily be a great burden in a Territory, and the District of Columbia is a compact population. Even in a Territory the commissioner who has to travel will bring his records to the place where the court sits. The district attorney will not have any traveling expenses from his home to look at the records in the cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of line 4, section 18, it is proposed to insert:

Without compensation therefor additional to that allowed by law.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the very next section allows these officers the money.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Chair will allow me, in section 18, line 4, after the word "therein," I move to insert "without additional compensation therefor."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator from Iowa, and I would like also the Senator from Massachusetts to give me his attention, whether either Senator intends that the district attorneys of the Territories shall have the additional duties and labors and burdens of the supervisorship put upon them without any additional pay to what they get now? Is that the purpose?

Mr. ALLISON. I have no purpose about it. I simply ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he intended to pay these district attorneys the compensation provided for herein, and he said he did not, and for myself I believe they should not have put on to a salary of $200 a salary of $3,000, as provided in the bill.

Mr. HALE. I agree with the Senator in that; but it seems to me that here is a class of officers who are not very well paid, and if you put on what may double their duties the Senator from Massachusetts who has charge of the bill should provide some suitable compensation to those officers for what you put upon them, not the $3,000 salary, for that would be enormous for the work, but something.

Mr. HOAR. These supervisors are to be appointed one for each of the nine circuits of the country, including on an average between thirty and forty districts. They are to examine the records of the cases; see that they are honestly conducted and see that the cases are pushed along; to make reports of any abuses; to make general reports to the Attorney-General of what they find. I do not suppose that in any Territory or in the District of Columbia the insolvency business will equal the average of one district in the States. The District of Columbia has, it is true, 275,000 inhabitants, but the trading or commercial or manufacturing business here is very small. It therefore would be only about a fortieth part of one man's work which is added to these officers; but it is not that, because there is no travel. The United States district attorney will find the records of all the bankruptcy cases in this District probably in the same building where his own office is, or very near by; so that he will have very little labor.

So it is in the Territories. Although the commissioners are to travel over large spaces, they will bring their records with them when they go to the place of holding the United States court, where the district attorney is. So the inspection of these cases, it seems to me, will not add a serious burden. It is only a fortieth part of a man's work. I do not think it is important to provide, and it was not intended to provide, and I do not think the bill does provide, any additional pay, because while it is said in the eighteenth section that the attorneys shall exercise the duties of supervisors, the next section says that the supervisors duly appointed and acting shall have the pay. Still if there is any doubt in the language, the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is highly proper, and I agree to it. It does not seem to me that there is any injustice or impropriety in this requirement; it will not be an additional trial to any of these district attorneys.

Mr. HALE. The Senator has answered my question and has removed my doubt about the matter, because he has evidently considered this beforehand and does not intend that there shall be any additional compensation, and does not believe that there is labor enough to entitle them to anything more than what they get as district attorneys. If he is satisfied with that, I am.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill provides who shall exercise in the District of Columbia and in the Territories of the United States the duties of supervisor therein, but it is silent upon the question as to how the commissioners in the District and in the Territories shall be appointed and of how many they shall consist. I would ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether that is intentional, or whether it is not desirable to have some declaration as to the number of commissioners that shall be appointed in the Territories and in the District of Columbia. In section 12, on page 8, it is provided that the commissioners shall not exceed in any State the number of members of Congress to which it is entitled, and the proviso which has been amended that in States not entitled to more than six members of Congress the number of commissioners shall not exceed three, &c., but there is nowhere in the bill any declaration as to the number of commissioners that shall be appointed in the Territories and in the District of Columbia. I suppose the omission was unintentional and ought to be supplied.

Mr. HALE. There is a reference to it in lines 13, 14, and 15 of section 12.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes.

The powers of appointment provided for in this section may be exercised in the District of Columbia by the supreme court of said District, and in the several Territories by the supreme courts thereof.

But there is no provision as to how many shall be appointed.

Mr. HALE. Is not that regulated by the previous provision as to the extent of the circuits?

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir; it is not, because they are not in the circuits. I will move to amend by adding after the word "entitled," in line 6, section 12:

And one commissioner in the District of Columbia, and one in each of the several organized Territories of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. My attention was called to that matter before the bill was reported, and the provision which the Senator has read was added, and I have an impression that it is in the bill somewhere; but it is possible that it may not be in, and I therefore have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. Should there be more than one in the District of Columbia?

Mr. HOAR. No; one is enough.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. In section 35, at the end of line 21, I move to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no person shall be eligible to serve as a juror in any trial under this act who has within two years prior thereto served as a juror in a similar trial, or within said time served as a juror in the district court in which the bankrupt's estate is administered.

Mr. HOAR. I hope that will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. I offer the following amendment, to come in as an additional proviso after the amendment just adopted:

Provided further, That all trials by jury under this act shall be, if demanded by the defendant, in the county of his residence if he reside in the district, unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the court that owing to prejudice or undue local influence the petitioners can not have a fair and impartial trial in said county, and in that case the trial shall be had in the nearest county thereto wherein a fair and impartial trial can be had. In all cases where the trial is not at the place where the district court is held the court may designate a commissioner to preside over the same, and if a new trial shall be granted or refused by the commissioner to either party, the party aggrieved by such action may except thereto and embody the evidence and rulings of the commissioner in a bill of exceptions, and thereupon the district court may review such action and affirm or reverse the same as law and justice may require.

Mr. HOAR. I hope that will be rejected. It makes a United States court possible in every county, and is unconstitutional as making a commissioner do the duties of a judge.

Mr. GEORGE. In answer to that I can say that the commissioner by this bill has a great deal more of what are called judicial duties to perform than are required in the amendment. In the amendment he simply presides at the trial; he renders no judgment; he can simply do as a sheriff would do who has a jury of inquest, ascertain a fact, and if a new trial is granted or refused by him it is subject to the supervision of the court.

If you look at the other provisions of the bill you will find that the commissioner may try the cause of bankruptcy. The very issue submitted to the jury may be tried by the commissioner under the bill; and yet while that is the provision of the bill, the Senator insists that the commissioner, notwithstanding he has the power himself to try the issue, has no right; that it would be unconstitutional for him to preside over a trial by jury of the same issue.

Then in another place the commissioner has a right to assess unliquidated damages in order to allow them to be proved before the court, which is more of a judicial function than presiding at a mere trial by a jury when he can not render judgment. Then all the proofs of debts are to be made before him, the accounts of trustees are to be passed by him, and he may issue warrants of arrest and sequestration of property. All this he can do under the bill, and that is not unconstitutional, and yet if he simply presides over a trial by jury without the power of rendering judgment, simply reporting to the court what the jury has done, that is unconstitutional.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. I move to strike out the last clause of section 36, beginning in line 14, in the following words:

The costs and counsel fees of involuntary proceedings which have proceeded to adjudication may be paid out of the assets to an amount not exceeding $200, if the court shall so order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. As that amendment has been lost I move to amend the clause by inserting after the word "exceeding," in line 17 of section 36, the words:

Five per cent. of the assets of the estate realized by the trustee for distribution among the general creditors, but such allowance shall in no case exceed.

So as to read:

The costs and counsel fees of the involuntary proceedings which have proceeded to adjudication may be paid out of the assets to an amount not exceeding 5 per cent. of the assets of the estate realized by the trustee for distribution among the general creditors, but such allowance shall in no case exceed $200, if the court shall so order.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. At the end of section 78 I move to add:

That no payment made or security given on a debt due any workman, mechanic, or laborer for work, labor, or service done or materials furnished by such person shall be held an unlawful preference under this act: Provided, That in making such payment or giving such security the debtor shall make an equal provision for all creditors of the class mentioned in this paragraph: And provided further, That no creditor shall be allowed to make any objection or claim any right on the ground that a provision so made is not equal except he be of the aforesaid class.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to say one word in support of the amendment. It is drawn so as to obviate the objections urged by the Senator from Massachusetts against the first amendment I offered on that subject. The objection he urged was that it allowed the debtor to prefer one of these workmen or laborers over another. This amendment is intended to obviate that objection and to secure a fair and equal distribution among all of that class.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to offer one amendment pro forma only, consisting of several sections to come in at the end of the bill, and have it printed in the RECORD. I do not care about having it read and detaining the Senate by its reading. Senators have all had it on their tables. It may be, and I know will be, rejected, but I desire to put it on record.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the Senator suggested, if it is within the rules of the Senate, that it may be printed and voted on without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr ALLISON. I should like to hear it read. If it is to be voted on I want to know what it is.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the amendment. Having read one section,

Mr. INGALLS. I understand this amendment is offered with the understanding that it is to be rejected. I can see no reason why it is to be read unless the Senator from Iowa insists upon it.

Mr. ALLISON. No, I do not. I have heard enough of the amendment to know how I shall vote on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to dispensing with the further reading of the amendment? The Chair hears none.

The amendment was to add as additional sections to the bill the following:

ASSIGNMENT IN PAIS.

SEC. —. That if any debtor owing $200 or more shall make an assignment of his estate, valid by the laws of the State or Territory in which he is domiciled, or if he have property in any other jurisdiction, then as to such property valid according to the law thereof, and also in accordance with the requirements of this act, it shall have the effect hereinafter provided for. Said assignment shall be to one or more trustees named therein, and shall convey all the estate of the debtor except such as is exempt by the law of his domicile from execution or liability for his debts, and shall be for the equal benefit of all his creditors except such as are hereinafter prohibited, or may be with preference hereinafter permitted. It shall be accompanied by a schedule of his unexempt property and a list of his creditors, with the amount due to and the residence of each, with a statement of the liens or incumbrances on the property, unless the property, creditors, and liens be stated in the body thereof; and said schedule and list shall be verified by his oath to be correct as near as he can make them. Said assignment shall also contain a provision conveying all his unexempt property, though not specified in said schedule, and shall provide for all his creditors, whether named in the list or not; and the omission of any property or creditor from said list or schedule, or any misstatement as to liens and incumbrances, shall have no effect against the debtor's rights under this act, unless the same be willfully fraudulent. (Said assignment shall not, however, contain any provision for the benefit of a creditor whose debt arose from or is based on, in whole or in part, any dealings "in futures," as hereinafter defined.) Said assignment may, so far as the debtor's rights under this act are concerned, contain any or all of the following preferences, namely: Debts and demands due to the United States, or to any State in which any of the property is situated, or to the servants and laborers of the debtor. Said assignment, schedule, and list shall also be recorded in the office or offices wherein mortgages on said property are by law recordable. The fees of trustees under said assignment may be fixed at any sum or percentage not exceeding the allowance to trustees as provided for in this act.

VOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY.

SEC. —. That within three months from the time of filing in the proper office said assignment for record the debtor may apply to the proper court to be declared a bankrupt. His petition shall set forth the making the assignment and his inability to pay his debts, and shall have exhibited with it a copy of said assignment, and also of the schedule and list aforesaid, if there be such, and also a schedule and list of any other property or creditor which he may have since discovered or remembered, and shall be verified by his oath, and when so verified shall be conclusive evidence of his right to be adjudged a bankrupt. On filing the same, notice as in other cases of voluntary bankruptcy shall be given by the clerk to the creditors. The debtor shall make the deposit for costs as provided in this act, but not to exceed in any case $15, unless the judge shall decide that a greater sum will be needed to pay the costs of the proceeding, on the supposition that the same will be uncontested. If within six months after filing said petition no objection be made, as hereinafter provided for, the debtor shall be discharged from all his debts and liabilities which he owed at the time of filing for record the assignment, and no further proceedings shall be had in his bankruptcy.

SEC. —. That objection may be made to said discharge by any creditor. Said objection may be made by a petition for involuntary proceedings in bankruptcy as hereinafter provided for, or by an answer filed to the debtor's petition, setting out the grounds thereof, and verified by the creditor's oath. If made by answer, it shall be filed within one month after the filing of the debtor's petition, and no proceedings shall be had on said answer; but where it has been seasonably filed any creditor may, as hereinafter provided, file a petition for involuntary proceedings against the debtor, and thereupon such proceedings shall be had as are hereinafter provided for; and if no petition be filed as required herein the answer shall be treated as disproved, and the debtor shall be discharged. If a debtor making said assignment owes less than $500, and if no proceedings for involuntary bankruptcy be commenced against him as aforesaid within six months from the filing for record of the assignment, he shall at the expiration of said term be by force of the assignment discharged from all the debts he owed at the time of making the same; and the original assignment, certified by the register or recorder or clerk of the office in which it is recorded that it was duly recorded on a day named in the certificate, or a copy so certified, shall be evidence in any court of his discharge, and shall have said effect if an attempt to procure involuntary proceedings against him shall be unsuccessful.

INVOLUNTARY PROCEEDINGS.

SEC. —. That after the filing for record of said assignment, proceedings for involuntary bankruptcy shall not be commenced against the debtor except as follows: The petition shall be filed within six months after the filing of the assignment for record, except that where the debtor has, after the filing of said assignment for record, as hereinbefore provided, also filed a petition to be declared a bankrupt; then said petition shall be filed within three months after the filing of the debtor's petition, unless objection to the debtor's discharge by answer be seasonably filed, as hereinbefore provided. In that case the petition for involuntary proceedings shall be filed within four months from the time of filing the debtor's petition. The creditor's petition shall state with clearness the grounds on which it is based, specifying both the act done and the property, and shall be verified by the oath of the petitioner. It shall not be filed without the previous order of the judge, who shall in all cases, before making said order, require the petitioner to give bond, with good sureties, to be approved by him, and be in a sufficient penalty, to be fixed by him, with conditions to pay and satisfy to the defendant all costs and all damages which he shall sustain by reason of such proceedings in case the same shall not be sustained, which bond, with the judge's approval thereon, shall be filed with the petition and become a part of the record. On filing the petition the deposit for fees and costs required by this act shall be made. The grounds for such involuntary proceedings shall be the following, or one of them, and no other, namely: In case the debtor is a trader, the same grounds as provided for in this act for involuntary proceedings against him. In all other cases the following: First, that the debtor has concealed some portion of his property with intent to defraud his creditors; second, that he has assigned some part of his property with like intent; third, that he has willfully, with like intent, omitted from his schedule or list any property which ought to have been included therein.

SEC. —. That on the filing of said petition at least ten days' personal notice shall be given to the debtor, who may take issue on the same by answer under oath. If issue be taken, it shall be tried by a jury, if either party demand it. If the verdict be for petitioner, the debtor shall be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt; if it be for the defendant, the jury shall at the same time find the damages sustained, and the judgment shall be that the defendant recover said damages and all costs from the obligors in said bond, and that he be also discharged from his debts which he owed at the time of filing said assignment for record. New trials may be granted according to the rules of the common law, but a new trial granted because the damages are excessive or insufficient shall not vitiate the verdict as to the issue, and judgment shall be entered on that as if no new trial had been granted as to the damages. If the judgment be adjudging the debtor an involuntary bankrupt, his petition for a discharge from his debts shall be dismissed if he has proceeded as a voluntary bankrupt.

SEC. —. That if the petitioner shall be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt, then a trustee shall be appointed as in other cases, and with like powers and duties in all respects; and the property assigned as herein provided for, as well as all other assets of the bankrupt, shall be subject to the jurisdiction of said court, to be administered in bankruptcy. Said court may remove the trustee or trustees named in the assignment, or direct him or them to proceed in the execution of the trust; and all acts done under said assignment and in pursuance thereof shall be valid.

SEC. —. The assignments made by partners in accordance with this act shall have like effect; but in such case the assignment shall contain a separate list of the society and separate creditors and property; and the preferences allowed by this act shall be for society creditors out of the partnership property, and for separate creditors out of the separate assets of the debtor partner.

SEC. —. That whenever the time of filing the assignment for record is mentioned in this act, it shall mean the time it shall be first filed in any proper office for record; but if there be more offices than one in which said assignment should be recorded, in that case, if it shall not be filed for record in all the offices in which it ought to be recorded within thirty days from the time of the first filing, the time at which it shall be filed lastly shall be the time meant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. I have one more amendment, and it is the last one I shall offer. At the end of section 85 I move to add:

And no debt shall be released by a discharge which may be due by any bank or individual for deposits or loans, either with or without interest, when such bank or individual has within twelve months before suspension or assignment for the benefit of creditors used its deposits or assets, or any part thereof, in buying or selling "futures" in any commodity whatever, or has lent the same to any person or corporation so engaged, or having reasonable ground to believe that the borrower would so use it, or where such bank or individual, being insolvent, shall have still continued to receive deposits or loans, or shall have misled in any way any depositor or lender as to his or its solvency.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say that this amendment would cover the case of every milkman who engaged to buy milk of a farmer to supply his customers. There are thousands of most harmless and innocent things in life that that would prohibit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. I should vote "nay" if he were here.

Mr. PIKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. VAN WYCK (when his name was called). I am paired on the bill with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. He is in favor of it and I am opposed to it.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted, but I at the moment forgot that I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL]. I do not know how he would vote on this amendment, and therefore I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. DOLPH (after having voted in the negative). I desire to withdraw my vote. I observe that my colleague [Mr. SLATER] is not in the Chamber, and I understand that I am paired with him on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote will be withdrawn if there be no objection.

Mr. HARRIS. Knowing that my vote will not change the result, notwithstanding my pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL], I will record my vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DOLPH. Understanding that there may be difficulty in having a quorum, I will now vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—10.

Brown,	Coke,	Harris,	Walker.
Call,	Garland,	Morgan,
Cockrell,	George,	Vance,

NAYS—30.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Ingalls,	Plumb,
Allison,	Edmunds,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Bayard,	Frye,	Jonas,	Riddleberger,
Blair,	Gibson,	Jones of Nevada,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Gorman,	Logan,	Sewell,
Conger,	Harrison,	Manderson,	Sherman.
Cullom,	Hawley,	Miller of Cal.,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Platt,

ABSENT—36.

Anthony,	Groome,	McPherson,	Ransom,
Beck,	Hale,	Mahone,	Sabin,
Bowen,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	Hill,	Miller of N. Y.,	Slater,
Camden,	Jones of Florida,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Pa.,	Kenna,	Morrill,	Vest,
Colquitt,	Lamar,	Palmer,	Voorhees,
Fair,	Lapham,	Pendleton,	Williams,
Farley,	McMillan,	Pike,	Wilson.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. VANCE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the vote on the passage of the bill may be taken to-morrow morning after the close of the routine morning business.

Mr. MILLER, of California, and others. Take it now.

Mr. HARRIS. Why not now?

Mr. HOAR. Because there are so many pairs that I doubt whether there will be a quorum. I withdraw the request if there is a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on the passage of the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALDRICH (when Mr. ANTHONY'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is absent on account of ill health. He is paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CAMDEN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. DOLPH (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with my colleague [Mr. SLATER] to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL]. I vote "yea."

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I was paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], but that pair has been transferred to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER]. I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] was paired with his colleague [Mr. DOLPH]. I was paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL]. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] and myself have transferred, he his pair to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL] and I mine to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER]. I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER]. I do not know how he would vote. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. COKE (when Mr. MAXEY'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired during his absence with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. PIKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. VANCE (when Mr. RANSOM'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. RANSOM] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. VAN WYCK (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. I should vote "nay" if he were here.

Mr. COCKRELL (when Mr. VEST'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. VEST] was paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], but the Senator from Kansas has voted "nay," and my colleague, if present, would vote "nay." My colleague is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER] being here and having voted the same way—the pair was made during his absence—as a matter of course my colleague [Mr. VEST] is not paired; but he would, if present, vote "nay," as the Senator from Arkansas has voted.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], if present, would vote in favor of the bill. He is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON].

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] is favorable to the bill, and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], with whom he is paired, would vote against it.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES].

Mr. KENNA. Since announcing my pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER], I have ascertained that he would vote "yea." The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is absent and would vote "nay," so my pair with the Senator from New York is transferred to the Senator from Missouri, and I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 15; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the bankruptcy bill be reprinted as it has passed the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the bankruptcy bill be reprinted as it will be engrossed.

The motion was agreed to.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the next business in order, being the special order, the bill (S. 1127) to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 21, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

TORPEDO SERVICE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting an estimate by the Chief of Engineers for the torpedo service in defense of harbors; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, BROOKLYN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a resolution of the House calling for information in relation to the purchase of a site for a public building in Brooklyn; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

JOHN K. BALL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from John K. Ball, musician, of Company B, Second United States Infantry, asking that authority be given for the issue of clothing gratuitously to said musician in lieu of articles stolen from him while on duty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. DUNCAN, on account of sickness.

PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION.

Mr. EATON, by unanimous consent, from the Select Committee on Law respecting the Election of President and Vice-President, reported back with amendments the bill (S. 22) to provide for the performance of the duties of the office of President in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice-President; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

AMERICAN COLLEGE, ROME.

Mr. EATON. I am requested, in behalf of Mr. CURTIN, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who is necessarily absent, to report back a resolution referred to that committee with a report recommending its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the following resolution, beg leave to report the same back and recommend its passage:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to send to this House all the facts and information he has concerning the threatened confiscation of the American College in Italy by any law or decree of the Italian Government."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. EATON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

W. J. HALE.

Mr. EATON. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to furnish this House with copies of all correspondence on file in the State Department relative to the claim of W. J. Hale against the Argentine Republic.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. EATON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE OVER RIO GRANDE.

Mr. HANCOCK. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 664, to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Rio Grande River between the cities of Laredo, in Texas, and Nueva Laredo, in Mexico.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

Mr. BEACH and others demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. That is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. COBB. I hope the gentleman from New York will not insist upon the demand for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen have insisted upon the demand.

DAILY HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. MORRISON. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Ways and Means. I am directed by the committee to report the following resolution and ask its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on and after April 22, 1884, the hour of daily meeting of the House for this session be 11 o'clock a. m.

Mr. KASSON. I would like to ask if that is such a privileged resolution as excludes it from the operation of the rule requiring one day's notice to be given for the change contemplated?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this is not a rule of the House which it is now proposed to change. The rules of the House do not fix the time of meeting, but the House by resolution at the beginning of the session provided that the daily session should begin at 12 o'clock until otherwise ordered. Besides that, this resolution was introduced some time ago by the gentleman from Missouri, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. MORRISON. This is a resolution which was offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER], and on his motion referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDALL. It will save night sessions and will shorten the session. That consideration ought to be conclusive in favor of the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say to my friend the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means that this resolution appears to cover the entire remainder of the session, while previous experience it seems to me renders it very doubtful whether it will really facilitate the business of the House to confine members here for six hours every day instead of five. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee or the Speaker if this order, being made by a majority vote, can, when the House finds it impracticable or inconvenient to take away so much time from the work of committees—whether in that case it can also be rescinded by a majority vote?

The SPEAKER. It can always be rescinded by a majority vote. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 95, noes 15.

So (further count not being called for) the resolution was adopted.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of States for the introduction and reference of bills and joint resolutions. Under this call resolutions and memorials of State and Territorial Legislatures are also in order for reference to appropriate committees, and also resolutions of inquiry addressed to heads of Departments.

PENSIONS TO UNION PRISONERS OF WAR.

Mr. GEDDES presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Ohio, for the passage of Senate bill 11 and House bill 1189; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and, by unanimous consent, ordered to be printed.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Joint resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives to vote for and urge the passage of Senate bill No. 11 and House No. bill 1189.

Whereas there has been introduced in the United States Senate bill No. 11 and in the House of Representatives bill No. 1189, asking for pensioning of prisoners of war who were confined in confederate military prisons during the late war: Therefore,

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and are hereby, requested to vote for and urge the passage of the same at the earliest practical moment, and that the governor forward a copy of this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Washington.

L. A. BRUNNER,
Speaker pro tempore of the House of Representatives.
JOHN G. WARWICK,
President of the Senate.

Adopted April 11, 1884.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, OHIO,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I, James W. Newman, secretary of state of the State of Ohio, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of a joint resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, on the 11th day of April, A. D. 1884, taken from the original rolls filed in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal, at Columbus, the 14th day of April, A. D. 1884.

[SEAL.] JAS. W. NEWMAN,
Secretary of State.

Res. 234) calling for a report upon the condition of the levees of the Mississippi River, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being the third Monday, the regular order is the call of committees for motions to suspend the rules. The call rests with the Committee on Printing.

REPRINT OF CERTAIN PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. SCALES. Under instructions from the Committee on Printing I move to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 235) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the Public Printer shall have received a sufficient number of orders for copies of the reports of the Tenth Census of the United States, or for the Compendium of the Tenth Census, or for the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion, or for the Rebellion Record, accompanied in each case by the cost price thereof, with 10 per cent. additional to warrant in his opinion the expense of putting the plates to press, he shall cause an edition or editions thereof to be printed: Provided, That the number of copies thus at any time printed shall not exceed the number ordered and paid for in advance of publication.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the resolution just read.

The resolution was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

TERM OF CERTAIN OFFICES.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I am instructed by the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service to move to suspend the rules that the bill (H. R. 4460) to repeal sections of the Revised Statutes restricting the term of certain offices to four years, and for other purposes, be taken from the House Calendar and passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all those portions of the following sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to wit, sections 769, 1864, 2217, 2244, 2613, and 3830, which fixed the term of offices of the officers therein mentioned at four years, and all other acts and parts of acts in so far as they create or declare a term of four years on the part of any officers in any of the said sections mentioned, are hereby repealed: Provided, however, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any of the officers mentioned in the said sections now in office, nor shall their term of office be in any wise affected by the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That the chief justice and the associate justices of the supreme court of every Territory hereafter to be appointed shall be appointed to hold office during good behavior, or until the Territory shall be admitted as a State and the State government shall go into operation, and all the other officers whose term of office is abolished by the provisions of this act shall be commissioned to hold office, and shall hold office, during the pleasure of the President.

SEC. 3. That every person hereafter appointed to any office of which the term is abolished by the provisions of this act, and of which the incumbent is now required to give an official bond, shall, before entering upon the duties of his office, give a bond to the United States, with one or more sufficient sureties, for the true and faithful discharge of the duties thereof according to law. The said bonds shall be in such form, and under such penalty, and approved in such manner, and filed in such offices as is now provided by law in the case of each of such officers; and such bonds shall be renewed once in three years, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the officers required to approve the same as are not inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a second.

Mr. BEACH. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a count.

The SPEAKER. A count being demanded, the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. MUTCHLER.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes 68.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House thirty minutes will be allowed for debate; fifteen minutes in support of the motion and fifteen minutes against it. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to control the time in opposition.

Mr. MUTCHLER. The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service unanimously recommend the passage of this bill. It is also recommended by all the civil-service-reform leagues of the country, including the National Civil-Service Reform League. The purpose of the bill is to repeal the act of 1820 and the acts supplementary thereto which limit the term of certain officers to four years.

Section 769 of the Revised Statutes limits the term of district attorneys to four years. Section 1864 limits the term of the chief-justice and the associate justices of the Territories to four years and until their successors shall be qualified. Section 2217 limits the term of surveyors-general to four years. Section 2244 limits the term of registers and receivers to four years. Section 2613 limits the term of collectors of customs and naval officers and surveyors of customs to four years. And the remaining section, 3830, limits the term of postmasters to four years, unless sooner removed.

Prior to the passage of the act of 1820 all these officers held their positions at the pleasure of the President. It was considered and is yet considered to be his constitutional privilege to retain in office whomsoever he chooses, and to dismiss at any time any officer he may feel disposed to dismiss. The repeal of the act of 1820 and the other acts in no way abridges the power of the President. He will still have the same power to remove any of the officers and to appoint others in their places. But the act of 1820 and the supplements thereto compel him to renew the commissions of these officers or appoint others in their places at the expiration of every four years. In other words, they interfere with the constitutional prerogative of the President, and say to him, "While you may appoint to office whomsoever you please, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, yet the officer so appointed shall not hold his term of office for a longer period than four years." And the consequence is that every four years the Executive and the Senate are likely to come in conflict with respect to the officer whose term expires. If the President renominates him the Senate of course has the privilege of rejecting him, and when there is a conflict between the Executive and the Senators the office remains vacant until that is ended.

In speaking of this law Mr. Jefferson, in a letter dated November 29, 1820, addressed to Mr. Madison, spoke of it as "the late mischievous law, vacating every four years nearly all the executive offices of the Government," and says of it:

It saps the constitutional and salutary functions of the President, and introduces a principle of intrigue and corruption which will soon leaven the mass, not only of Senators but of citizens. It is more baneful than the attempt which failed at the beginning of the Government to make all officers irremovable but with the consent of the Senate. This places every four years all appointments under their power, and obliges them to act on every one nomination. It will keep in constant excitement all the hungry cormorants for office, render them, as well as those in place, sycophants to their Senators, engage them in eternal intrigue to put out one and put in another, in cabals to swap work, and make of them what all executive directories become, mere sinks of corruption and faction.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. BUCKNER. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MUTCHLER] takes his seat I would like to ask him a question. It is whether the provisions of this bill affect in any way the power of the President to remove, as now?

Mr. MUTCHLER. No, sir; the provisions of the bill do not affect the power of the President to remove. They only obviate the necessity of his reappointing a faithful officer and taking a risk that the Senate will confirm him at the end of every four years.

Mr. WILLIS. I should prefer hearing some gentleman in opposition before I make my remarks in support of the bill.

Mr. MORSE. There may be none.

Mr. WILLIS. If there is no one objecting to the bill I will proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MUTCHLER] has eight minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. MCMILLIN. In the few minutes allotted to me I will say to the House that it does seem to me that after sixty-four years of the operation of the present law in the Government of the United States, and after a longer term than that of a similar experience in State governments, we ought to hesitate before we put our hands upon this law, under a fifteen minutes' debate on each side, and demolish it. No man in this country has a higher esteem than I have for the great statesman Mr. Jefferson, whose utterances have been read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but he like other men may have been fallible. Besides, we are now confronted by statutes which Jefferson never dreamed of. Was the tenure-of-office act—passed to tie President Johnson's hands—in existence when Mr. Jefferson wrote that letter? Its history is known to all. Its object was to take away from Mr. Johnson the constitutional right to remove an officer. It was passed in 1867, and is in these words:

SEC. 1767. Every person holding any civil office to which he has been or hereafter may be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall have become duly qualified to act therein, shall be entitled to hold such office during the term for which he was appointed, unless sooner removed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or by the appointment, with the like advice and consent, of a successor in his place, except as herein otherwise provided.

The penalty for its violation is as follows:

SEC. 1772. Every removal, appointment, or employment made, had, or exercised contrary to sections 1767 to 1770, inclusive, and the making, signing, sealing, countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed a high misdemeanor, and every person guilty thereof shall be imprisoned not more than five years or fined not more than $10,000, or both.

Sir, under the old law it did not require the "consent" of the Senate for the President to remove an inefficient officer, as it does now. Repeal this disgrace to the statutes, and then it will be time to come and ask us to enlarge the powers of those who happen to hold office by appointment. But I will never vote for the bill while the "tenure-of-office act" remains on the statute-books. What would be the effect of it? A President appoints his henchmen and partisans to office; his term expires; he is succeeded by another, who honestly thinks the good of the service requires changes; but the Senate, holding over, and in sympathy with those already in, refuses its "consent" to any change. You have life-service, with all the evils attendant upon it. I want no officer to feel that he has immunity against removal for life.

I want to call the attention of the members of this House to one fact: There are thirty-eight States in the Union. I wish to know what member of this House represents a State where life-tenure of office is tolerated by the people?

Mr. RYAN. Or desired, either.

Mr. McMILLIN. Yes; or desired.

Mr. BEACH. In Connecticut.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is it universal there? I have no information on the subject, but I will venture Connecticut has no such law.

Mr. BEACH. In the case of judges.

Mr. McMILLIN. I undertake to say that there is no such universal law as that in any State of this Union. And I do not hesitate to say further that the party which would attempt to inaugurate such a system in a State government would be and should be hurled from power. We want no less obligation to serve the country faithfully felt by this class than they now feel. If an officer is faithful in the discharge of the trust committed to him by the President, and the Senate by confirmation, it is but little trouble to reappoint him. But if he is not faithful his term of service should be allowed to expire, and without any action on the part of the Executive he should be relieved of the authority which has been conferred upon him.

Mr. EATON. I want to say to my friend from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] if he will permit me——

Mr. McMILLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. EATON. The member from New York [Mr. BEACH] is entirely mistaken. There is no such tenure in Connecticut. There was once, but we turned Democratic and got rid of it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then I repeat, who is there here that represents a State that tolerates such a system? Not a man of us all. And yet the tendency from year to year is to place officers of the Government of the United States more and more distant from the people, every year to remove them further from the control of the people; a thing which we ought not to do. Mr. Speaker, no man is more anxious for true civil-service reform than I. No man would more gladly see the service restored to what it should be. No man is more anxious to see the time come when officers or the Government are no longer fleeced annually for campaign purposes. But this official millennium will never be brought around by simply telling those now in, who have been guilty of the assessment-fleecing and other wrongful acts, that they may hold their offices during the remainder of their lives.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I will yield three minutes of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, as the introducer of the present bill, I will ask briefly the attention of the House.

On the 13th of December, 1880, which was in the last session of the Forty-sixth Congress, I introduced the bill now in my hand (H. R. 6562), entitled "A bill to reform the civil service of the United States." It was the first bill of that nature in either branch of that Congress. The last six sections of that bill provided for entrance to the public service through competitive examinations. This has since been secured by the passage of the bill which bears the name of Senator PENDLETON, nor will any one ever desire to take from him that honor, for to his eloquence, zeal, courage, and fidelity was its success chiefly due. At this late day I may, however, with pardonable pride, as a bit of legislative history, recall the fact, not heretofore made public, that the Pendleton bill was the immediate outgrowth or result of this bill, the New York Civil-Service Association, complying with a request, having sent as an amendment or substitute thereto the document now also before me, which is the original draught of the Pendleton bill.

The first two sections of this bill of 1880 are identical in their object with the bill now before the House. What is that object? Is it to secure a life-tenure, as charged by the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. McMILLIN]? He is utterly mistaken in that statement. There is not one word in this bill that implies or justifies a life-tenure of office. There are political offices and there are non-political offices in this country. Not one office affected by this bill is a political office. Even if the bill contemplated life-tenure, the answer to the argument of the gentleman would be that none of the offices affected by it are political in their character, and they ought not, therefore, to be made the rewards and counters of political services.

Mr. McMILLIN. They are all made political.

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; and that is the point I am coming to.

Mr. WELLER. I would like to find an office in this country that is not political.

Mr. WILLIS. It is not true that you can not now find an office in this country which is not a political office. I admit, and with regret, that political influences largely control many offices like those embraced in this bill, which properly should be divorced from politics. But I do not concede the broad proposition stated by the gentleman. Official life comprises three departments—civil, military, and naval. In two of these departments—in the Navy and in the Army—officers hold their position "during the pleasure of the President." Would the gentleman limit the terms of our naval and army officers to four years, and thus place them in the category of district attorneys and Presidential postmasters, to be renewed from time to time, not because of gallant and faithful service, but permitted to expire without reference to these considerations? If so, he is consistent in his opposition to this bill. England, up to a period within the memory of men now living, appointed her military officers in the same way that we appoint our civil officers. Personal favoritism, partisan intrigue, and political despotism secured the appointments. The military service there, like the civil service here, was dominated by selfish interests, fraud, and coercion. As to the other department of official life, the civil service, it is, as we all know, subdivided into the judicial, legislative, and executive branches. And here again the statement of the gentleman is not sustained by the facts. I deny that our judicial positions as a rule are political offices, and I still more emphatically deny that they should be political. As to the executive offices of the Government, they ought to reflect the will of the party in power in all offices where that will is properly involved. In legislative offices, also, there can hardly be too frequent opportunities afforded for change. No friend of civil-service reform seeks or desires stability, much less permanency of tenure, for legislative offices. The changing opinions and views of the people should be reflected by their legislators, subject only to the proposition which the people thoroughly understand, and by which more and more every year they are controlled, that without experience even the highest character and capacity may be found insufficient.

This bill does not propose to interfere with any of these high prerogatives of the people in the choice of those legislative agencies which give character to the nation, which direct its power, express its will, and direct its policies. The officers mentioned in this bill, collectors and surveyors of customs, postmasters, district attorneys, surveyors-general, registers and receivers, naval officers, the chief-justices and associate justices of Territories, what are they but the ministerial agents of the Government, whose duties are plainly prescribed by the legislative department, the department which is directly and constantly responsible to and controlled by the people? What political consequence should attach to these offices? What reason can be given why they should be active political partisans? Why should the public be deprived of the services of any one of these officers who has been faithful, honest, and capable? If they are not such officers, why should they be permitted to hold their term for four years? If they are thoroughly qualified, why should they at the end of four years be set adrift and other perhaps incompetent and dishonest men take their places? Can any answer be given to these questions except that these offices have under our miserable "spoils" system been used and regarded, not as public trusts, but as bribes to secure partisan service?

But, says my friend from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN], this bill reverses the well-settled and accepted policy of our Government. If that were true, a higher question before us is whether what we now propose to do is right. If right, it ought to be done regardless of past precedent. I do not think any of us are especially enamored of our civil service since the war; but excluding that period, the gentleman's statement will not hold good as to the duration of the present system. Our Government lived and flourished from its foundation up to the year 1820 before any of these officers held a four-year term, and it was not until 1836 that party greed reached out for the Post-Office Department.

What was the condition of the country during that time? Did we have those prescriptive removals which now daily disgrace our civil service, illustrating at once private injustice and public misfortune? What are the well-known facts? Washington made only nine removals, all of which were for cause; John Adams made nine, and none of them were for political reasons; Jefferson made thirty-nine, and we have his repeated declarations that none of them were for political opinions; Madison made only five, Monroe only nine, John Quincy Adams only two. In the first forty years of our Government there were only seventy-three removals from office, and all of these were for cause. Compare that period with any forty years since and an argument unanswerable is furnished in favor of this bill.

We all know how this policy was changed; how for party purposes, without debate, in stealth and in conspiracy against the people, the act of 1820 was passed reducing the constitutional tenure of the most important executive offices, and we know, too, the disastrous consequences which have followed and which will follow until it is repealed.

These consequences were not slow in their appearance nor were the great statesmen of that day unaware of their character. Mr. Calhoun, who was then Secretary of War, declared the law at the time "one of the most dangerous ever passed, and that it would work a revolution." In five years from its passage Mr. Macon made a report in the Senate repealing the act, but the people had not yet fully realized their danger, and the effort was ineffectual. In the mean while fraud and peculation, bribery and intrigue, were rampant in the land. Two hundred and ninety-seven defaulting collectors and other officers were reported to the House by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The people became justly alarmed. Another repealing act—this one in 1835—passed the Senate by a vote of 31 to 16. Among those voting for the repeal we find the names of Clay, Calhoun, Webster, Benton, Ewing, Southard, and White.

Mr. Webster declared that the evil effects of the act of 1820 had vastly predominated; that "a very great change has taken place within a few years in the practice of the executive government. I am for staying the further contagion of this plague. Men in office have begun to think themselves mere agents and servants of the appointing power."

Mr. Clay said "the tendency had been to revive the Dark Ages of feudalism and to render office a feudatory."

Mr. Benton said the law of 1820 had become the means of getting rid of faithful officers, and the expiration of the four years' term came to be considered as the vacation of all officers on whom it fell. Mr. Calhoun declared that officers and people are being taught "that the most certain road to honor and fortune is servility and flattery. * * * I have marked its progress in a thousand instances within the last few years. * * * What a few years since would have shocked and aroused the whole community is now scarcely perceived or felt, and when it is openly avowed that the public offices are the spoils of the victors it scarcely produces a sensation."

Mr. Jefferson in a letter to Mr. Madison, which has already been quoted in this discussion, referring to the act of 1820, declared:

> It saps the constitutional and salutary functions of the President, and introduces a principle of intrigue and corruption which will soon leaven the mass not only of Senators but of citizens. It is more baneful than the attempt, which failed at the beginning of the Government, to make all officers irremovable but with the consent of the Senate. This places, every four years, all appointments under their power, and even obliges them to act on every * * * nomination. It will keep in constant excitement all the hungry cormorants for office; render them, as well as those in place, sycophants to their Senators; engage these in eternal intrigue to turn out one and put in another, in cabals to swap work; and make of them, what all executive directories become, mere sinks of corruption and faction. It must have been one of the midnight signatures of the President, when he had no time to consider or even read the law.

If these comments were true then, how immeasurably more so now, when we have a hundred thousand office-holders in the land. Will any candid man deny that the strongest language of these criticisms is justifiable by the every-day experience of our civil service or that the most far-reaching prophecies and forebodings in which these fathers of the Republic indulged have been fully verified? Is the whole subject of reform more hopeful now than it was then? Are bribery, coercion, and "bossism" less prevalent? Is proved competency more potent than partisan zeal and subserviency?

Are honesty, capacity, and fidelity the sure and only qualifications for office, or do they still stand aside at the dictate of selfish and personal power? Do we not know that more and more spoils have been as essential as more and more victims to a beast of prey? At no period of our history has that system been more voracious, more despotic, or more proscriptive and aggressive. And in arbitrary and tyrannical removals how does this era compare with the first forty years of our Government? Then, as we have seen, there was not an average of two removals a year. Compare this record, not with that of the whole country, but with one city, New York. From the year 1858 to 1861 (three years) there were in the custom-house at that city out of 690 offices 389 removals.

From 1861 to 1864 (three years) out of 702 offices there were 525 removals. Under Collector Smyth, in three years, out of 903 offices there were 830 removals. Under Collector Grinnell, in sixteen months, out of 892 offices there were 510 removals, which was an official execution every day of his term, with thirty extras for Sundays. The aggregate result was that in the 1,565 secular days preceding the year 1871, when Mr. Arthur was appointed, there were 1,678 removals from office in the New York custom-house, or more than at the rate of one for every such day for five years continuously. Need there be anything but the statement of these facts and figures to condemn the corrupt and corrupting system under which they flourish—a system which makes the public offices of the country partisan lazarets, in which all independent, unselfish, and patriotic feelings are unknown, and to which servility and venality are the only "open sesame."

This is the system which has grown up since the days of Washington and Jefferson, and which is largely dependent upon the sections of the Revised Statutes whose proposed repeal seems to arouse such illogical opposition. I repeat, sir, that this bill does not look to life-tenure or permanency of tenure. It is not an innovation upon our political institutions. It does not propose some new and untried experiment. It does not seek an unknown path; it simply proposes that we shall go back to the original path prescribed by the founders of our Government, and followed, as we have seen, by Washington, by Adams, by Jefferson, by Madison, by Monroe, and by all the statesmen who started upon its career of glory the civil service of the United States.

We propose by this legislation to return to the early and constitutional practice of the Government. We propose that now, as then, fidelity and good behavior, and these alone, shall be the condition of continuance in office. And why should not this be the case? Why should the people consider the business of the Government from a different standpoint than their own business? What an absurdity that business man would be guilty of who should discharge his clerks at the end of every four years, regardless of the experience which they had acquired, regardless of the honesty and fidelity with which they had discharged all the duties devolved upon them. And what inducement to faithful service would there be or can there be to the public or private servant over whom such a constant menace hangs? Does it secure better service to declare, as we do now by existing law, that no competency, no honesty or fidelity, can prevent discharge when this fixed period has arrived?

This bill proposes to avert that menace. It proposes to fasten upon the President the odium and the responsibility of arbitrary and causeless removals from office. But, sir, in the limited time allowed me it would be impossible to even touch upon the facts and arguments in favor of the pending bill. I congratulate the committee upon their unanimous recommendation of its passage. I congratulate them that they have sought to give the power of commanding law to sentiments which are embodied in the platforms of all the great political parties of the country. Higher than the tariff, higher than any economic or financial question stands this great problem of the elevation and purification of the civil service of our Government. The vote about to be taken will disclose the friends of that reform. Whether they be in the majority or not, this great cause will still go on. This Congress in its wisdom may revile and trample this bill under its feet, as a former Congress did a similar bill, but if so we will appeal from that decision to a tribunal which creates Congresses, the sovereign people of these United States, who will again as in the past declare their will, and when declared it will be promptly registered here as the law of the land.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MUTCHLER] has five minutes of his time remaining, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has twelve minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I will reserve the remainder of my time until I have heard the other side.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield three minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER (from the Clerk's desk). I will speak from the Clerk's desk, because my own seat is not a very eligible one.

The bill before the House proposes to make two very important changes in the tenure of office: first, with regard to appointments; second, with regard to removals. Under the operation of the first section of this bill all persons who are mentioned in the clauses or sections of the Revised Statutes referred to will hold their offices during the pleasure of the President.

The sections of the Revised Statutes repealed are as follows:

Section 769, which limits the term of office of district attorneys to four years; section 1868 which limits the terms of chief-justices and associate justices of the Territories to four years and until their successors are qualified; section 2217, which limits the terms of surveyors-general to four years; section 2244, which limits the terms of registers and surveyors to four years; section 2613 limits the term of collectors of customs, of naval officers, and of surveyors of customs to four years; and section 2613, which limits the term of postmasters to four years unless sooner removed.

If this bill shall become a law, then the terms of all these officers will be so changed that the officers mentioned will continue in office during the pleasure of the President. I am opposed to that provision; I prefer that these officers should remain under the fixed terms to which they are now limited by law. There is another provision of this bill to which I am opposed, section 2 of the bill, which is as follows:

> That the chief-justice and the associate justices of the supreme court of every Territory hereafter to be appointed shall be appointed to hold office during good behavior, or until the Territory shall be admitted as a State and the State government shall go into operation, and all the other officers whose term of office is abolished by the provisions of this act shall be commissioned to hold office, and shall hold office, during the pleasure of the President.

As to the judicial officers of the Territories of the United States, this bill proposes to put them beyond the reach of the President, and they can be removed only by impeachment. If there should be a change of administration at the next Presidential election, the political dead-beats who are now pensioned upon the Government and inflicted upon the good people of the Territories in judicial positions will be placed beyond the power of our President, and can be removed only by the impeaching power of the Government. I hope the Democratic party of the House of Representatives will not attempt to enact such an outrage upon the people. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WELLER. Amen; that is good.

Mr. WILLIS. It is the law now.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Every judicial officer of the United States now holds his office until removed on impeachment.

Mr. SPRINGER. If it is the law now, which I deny, why put it into this bill?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE].

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I am in hearty sympathy with the professed objects of this bill; but it does not appear to me that it will accomplish the purpose designed. If appointments which now stand at a fixed term of four years should be held at the pleasure of the President, it would be an increase rather than an abridgment of the Presidential patronage. The patronage of the Executive now places in the hands of one man a power too great for a republican form of government. We can not but reflect that when the sovereign people at the ballot-box select men for office the term is fixed; and there is no revocation of the exercise of this sovereign power except by some judicial proceeding for malfeasance in office. And when a single man, the servant of the people, appoints to office, should he remove and appoint again at his pleasure? Is that civil-service reform?

Mr. Speaker, if the term of office of these officers of the United States were so fixed that it would not coincide with the Presidential term—if appointees could be removed from partisan influences—there would be some approximation to genuine civil-service reform. Suppose, Mr. Speaker, that these officers had a tenure of seven years, or some other period not coterminous with Presidential terms, so that the change of administration would not remove faithful and competent officers. It might not be as well immediately for an incoming party under a change of administration, but in the long run both parties and the Government of the country would be infinitely benefited.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I very heartily sympathize with every effort made to elevate and purify the civil service of our Government, and if I believed that the tendency of this measure was toward that result I should give it my earnest support. I do not believe that any effort at civil-service reform will ever be thoroughly effectual until the motive for increasing public employments, the incentive to competition for public office, shall have been at least modified, if not removed. I notice that in all the plans proposing to purify the civil service the fact is always left out of the account that the struggle for public employment under the Federal Government is animated and intensified by the greater compensation paid to officers and employés of the United States than to officers and employés of the several States, and vastly more than competent men receive in private employments for corresponding service requiring a similar degree of ability and integrity. I indulge in no hope of a beneficial reform in our civil service or its efficiency, purity, and elevation until the Government is administered in the spirit of our institutions and on the same general basis of economy which characterizes the great body of our people, and which controls everywhere in private occupations and employments. I admit I see no tendency to this radical reform.

But, Mr. Speaker, this line of remark is not pertinent to the pending measure.

This bill proposes to repeal all the provisions of law, running back more than half a century, by which certain officers and employés of the United States are limited to an official tenure of four years—district attorneys, marshals, registers and receivers of land offices, collectors of customs, judges of the Territories, postmasters, assistant treasurers, and others.

This measure, it is assumed, is in harmony with legislation already inaugurated and still in a large degree experimental. I hardly think it is. The limitation of periods for holding office, as gentlemen will observe, applies largely to those officers who are in a large degree connected with financial and monetary affairs—collectors and custodians of public funds. The laws limit, and have limited almost from the beginning of the Government, the term of office of officials engaged in the collection and disbursement of public moneys.

In all these instances of official limitation the Federal Government has been inspired by the same motive which has influenced the policy of the States. Does it not occur to gentlemen that in many, perhaps most, of the States of the Union there is, as to officers having control of public funds, not only a limited official term but an absolute constitutional ineligibility to the office for a second or third term—at least until a specific period shall have intervened? Why has that constitutional rule been adopted? The reason is manifest. It is because from time to time official accounts should be closed, should be subjected to final examination, should be exposed to public observation. Thus in the States and in all the subdivisions of States the termination of the tenure of offices at stated periods has a healthy and invigorating effect upon the administration of public affairs by imposing a definite and fixed responsibility on the public officer. Why should not the effect be the same in the Federal Government? Why should not a similar limitation of official tenure be more important in the business of the Federal Government in view of the remoteness of those offices from public vigilance than in that of the States?

The mere fact that an officer may be at once reappointed does not impair the value of this official limitation, for the expiration of the term of itself subjects the affairs of the office to public and official scrutiny, and the conduct and merit of the officer is brought under public review. The very fact that the term expires calls public attention to the official conduct of the officer and subjects his official conduct to the examination of those desiring to succeed him and of the appointing power, and brings to notice any inefficiency in his public duties or irregularities in his accounts. One of the strong reasons for the short term of a member of this House is that the people at short intervals may review the official acts of their representatives.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that the tenure-of-office act, which as we all know has been passed since the days of Mr. Jefferson, puts it in the power of a Senate politically hostile to the President to prevent him from exercising the power of removal, a power which existed fully in the days of Mr. Jefferson. This is an important distinction, and the bill now proposed ought not to pass unless at the same time we repeal that infamous tenure-of-office act.

Mr. HOLMAN. The tenure-of-office law was enacted to cripple the administration of President Andrew Johnson, and the men who enacted it seemed willing to paralyze his administration even if it put in jeopardy great public interests. There seems to be no haste in surrendering the power that remarkable measure created.

But, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that fixing the term of office held by appointment at the reasonable period of four years has a high value in moral effect on our public service. An officer, especially if he be charged with the collecting, safe-keeping, or disbursing of public funds, having an indefinite official period before him, is especially subject to temptation and most liable to be its victim; but with a limited term of four years before him the fact is ever present that the question of reappointment must come under review at a fixed period. Will any gentleman say that this of itself is not an incentive to integrity and good conduct? I think experience everywhere has demonstrated you will have a better public service when you bring your officers to frequent accountability. I should greatly prefer seeing your offices now held for life reduced to fixed terms than to see them enlarged.

Another effect, Mr. Speaker, is that this act of 1820, now sought to be repealed, was passed during the administration of Mr. Monroe, a singularly pure administration, according to the history of those times. Manifestly for public reasons this law was enacted and extended from time to time to other offices, and in its main features it has remained in force from that day to the present time. Is it safe to remove a measure which has worked reasonably well all these years? Are gentlemen safe in assuming that it can be repealed without injury to your public service? I hope this bill will not pass. A measure of such weight, proposing as it does to remove one of the old landmarks which has come down to us from an early period of our history, involving the accountability of public officers, ought not to be passed on such a brief debate as the rules of the House allow.

No, sir, this limitation on the term of public offices filled by appointment ought not to be repealed. I do not believe that any measure tending to create life-tenures of office is in harmony with our free institutions. Offices filled by appointment, with reasonable and fixed terms, the officer subject to removal, to give efficiency to the administration of government, and those filled by the votes of the people, with brief terms and direct responsibility to the people, bringing the conduct of the public officer under frequent review, have been in the past and will be in the future the best guarantee our people can have of responsible and efficient government. Life-tenure of office, with the conduct of the public officer removed from the constant review of the power that fills the office, is not in harmony with our system of government.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has five minutes remaining.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I will yield for one minute to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY].

Mr. FINDLAY. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose, and indeed it would be impossible, to make anything like a speech on this subject in one minute's time, but in support of the pending measure I wish to have embodied in my remarks a letter which I have received from Mr. George B. Cole, secretary of the Civil Service Reform Association of Maryland. I ask, if there is not time to read it, that by unanimous consent it shall be ordered to be printed in the RECORD. But before my time closes I should like just to read what was said by Thomas Jefferson to James Madison, both of them founders of the Government and true interpreters of the Constitution they had framed, both of them knowing as much of the spirit and genius of the Government as any two men and perhaps more than any who ever lived. After the act of May 15, 1820, went into force the evil effects of it, of which we are now trying to get rid by the measure introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LYMAN] and reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MUTCHLER]—after its evil effects became apparent Thomas Jefferson addressed to Mr. Madison a letter, in which he said:

> It saps the constitutional and salutary functions of the President and introduces a principle of intrigue and corruption which will soon leaven the mass not only of Senators but of citizens. It is more baneful than the attempt, which failed, at the beginning of the Government, to make all officers irremovable but with the consent of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. FINDLAY. I ask that the letter to which I have referred be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

The letter is as follows:

THE CIVIL SERVICE REFORM ASSOCIATION OF MARYLAND,
Baltimore, April 18, 1884.

SIR: The Civil Service Association of Maryland respectfully requests that as a Representative from our State you support and in every proper manner endeavor to secure the passage of House bill No. 4460, being the bill to repeal sections 769, 1864, 2217, 2244, 2613, and 3830 of the Revised Statutes, and all other acts or parts of acts in so far as they create or declare a term of four years on the part of any officers in any of the said sections mentioned.

The considerations tending to show the propriety of the course of action here requested are very plain, and the arguments to be advanced in its favor are very simple and trite. Nevertheless it is respectfully submitted that they are of overwhelming force.

If, in view of the evils of the system which has prevailed in the civil service of the General Government and in our own, as well as in nearly all, if not in all, of the other States, our lawmakers were urged to enter upon the field of altogether untried experiment, it would be in the highest degree reasonable that they should do so in the mere hope of finding something that would be an improvement on the present shameful system. And they might take any proceeding looking to a change of any kind in full confidence that any change whatever must be for the better and could not possibly make matters worse than they are.

But independently of the native or a priori force of the considerations alluded to above, the fact is that in seeking the legislation referred to we are not asking our Representatives to travel new and untried paths. We are simply asking them to return to that system which was prevalent in the earlier years of the Republic, to that system a departure from which has shaken the very foundations of our Government, and a return to which is, in our humble judgment, the only thing which can restore that Government to that which in the wisdom of its founders it was intented to be, and a persistence in which is the only thing which can preserve it in its purity. It was intended to be a government by the people for the people, and not a government by politicians for politicians. That it has become mainly the latter no candid man can doubt. And surely if the Representatives of any other State could be in any uncertainty on this point, the recent and still pending scrambles for office in this city and State should be sufficient to set the question at rest in the mind of any Representative from Maryland.

The present system, or want of system, in our national, State, and municipal civil service has brought into being and keeps in being three distinct armies of professional office-seekers, which can be numbered by the hundreds of thousands, and has withdrawn them from the fields of production or useful industry. The smallest of these armies consists of the "ins" of the party in power; the next in size the "outs" of the same party, and the third and largest the professional politicians and place-hunters of the party which happens to be out of power. The two former fight each other with a hatred almost as mortal as that with which they combine to fight the other, and the country is continually torn and disturbed by the contests of these contending forces.

The office-holder has but little encouragement to fit himself for the performance of his duties. As the end of his term approaches, if not in the beginning, he is naturally engaged in thought and action in the effort to retain his place, or, if that seems to be impracticable, to step into some other. If he can not do this, he goes to join one of the great armies of the "outs," and, unfitted by his official career for most of the ordinary pursuits of life, he shuffles along as best he can in some shiftless way, as most of the soldiers of these armies do, waiting for the next distribution of the spoils, in the hope that in compensation for such party work as he may do in the mean time something will again fall to his share.

If the immense numbers of men who are now living from hand to mouth without regular or useful employment, and waiting for something to turn up for them in the changes in political affairs, could be made to know that no vacancies would occur in public offices except by death, resignation, or removals for cause, and that when a vacancy did occur the law had placed it beyond the power of any politician to prostitute the place for political gain, and could thus be driven into becoming producers instead of drones, we would have an accession to the industries of the land greater than years of immigration could supply, and incalculable good would be done, altogether regardless of that which would flow from having the business of the Government conducted on business principles by means of having the offices occupied by men selected and retained because of their fitness and integrity.

This is just what we ask, that is to say: That the business of the Government shall be reduced to and conducted on a business basis; that all men may be made to know that no man can be appointed to place unless he can show himself to be fitted by character and attainments for the place he seeks; and that no man once appointed need fear removal so long as he proves himself faithful and efficient in service. Human nature is much the same under all conditions. If office-holders are given to understand that faithfulness and efficiency will secure retention and promotion, they will be faithful and efficient just as surely as that if they are given to understand that political subserviency is the best means to the same end they will be politically subservient.

Political corruption has grown into a science by reason of the temptations to its practice and development furnished by our present civil-service abuses. Its professors are numerous and skillful; but its perpetuation in anything like its present proportions is only possible by a preservation of the present status. The poor unfortunate who has had some little office where for a time he could make more and with less work than he could earn at a regular calling is particularly susceptible to the temptation of seeking to carry an election by fraud; and even men of whom much better things might be expected have come to think, and often, without a blush, to say, that "anything is fair in politics."

But take away the bait of public office; let it be known that whatever party may come into power, the business machinery of the Government will move right along without any change, "natural wear and tear excepted," and but few men will be found who would think it worth their while to stuff a ballot-box or falsify a poll-book, however slight the risk of punishment; pure elections would become the rule instead of being, as now, the marked exception; the ballot would again come to be considered sacred, and there would be a marked and general elevation of the tone of public sentiment.

Evidences no doubt have been and will be submitted to you going to show the beneficent effect here and elsewhere of legislation of this kind, and for this reason it is not thought necessary in this letter to go into a statement of this evidence. Suffice it to say that it is of the most convincing character and is almost absolutely all on one side of the question, and that on the side where every reasonable man would expect to find it.

If, in addition to the reasons above given for the passage of the measure, it could be necessary to look for others appealing more personally to each individual member of both Houses of Congress, we should not have far to seek. No one knows better than the members themselves how much of their valuable time is consumed by answering appeals to them for their friendly offices in securing the appointment of some one of their constituents to some office which they have no more to do with officially than they have with the office of prime minister to the Shah of Persia. And yet each member is also aware that his readiness to answer such appeals, or his failure to do so, may have more effect in determining the question whether or not his constituents will again think him fit for his high trust than any action he may take after days of anxious thought upon the most important measure of the session.

We are entirely convinced that there is no member who will not rejoice and do his utmost to further any measure which will tend to make his receiving the highest mark of popular approval depend rather upon his ability to distinguish from among the measures before Congress those best suited to the needs of the country than upon his acuteness in selecting for his support the candidate for collector of customs who has the best grip upon the machine. That the measure now presented to you will accomplish much in this direction there can be no doubt. When there are no vacancies occurring by limitation or at stated periods their number will be comparatively few, and the importunity of applicants will be correspondingly diminished, while members of Congress, heads of Departments, and the city of Washington will all be saved from the periodical invasion and inundation of office-seekers to which they are now exposed. We have already said that the measure proposed is but a return to the better and purer ways of the early days of the Republic, and in proof of this we would in conclusion submit a passage from a letter of Thomas Jefferson to Madison, where with a foresight which was almost prophecy he foretold the evils to come from the passage of some of the very acts which the bill now before you will repeal.

In speaking of "the late mischievous law (act 15th May, 1820) vacating every four years nearly all the executive offices of the Government," he says:

"It saps the constitutional and salutary functions of the President and introduces a principle of intrigue and corruption which will soon leaven the mass not only of Senators but of citizens. It is more baneful than the attempt, which failed, at the beginning of the Government, to make all officers irremovable but with the consent of the Senate. This places every four years all appointments under their power and obliges them to act on every one nomination. It will keep in constant excitement all the hungry cormorants for office; render them, as well as those in place, sycophants to their Senators; engage them in eternal intrigue to put one out and put in another, in cabals to swap work; and make of them what all executive directories become, mere sinks of corruption and faction."

Can any man read this and not acknowledge that Thomas Jefferson was also among the prophets?

On behalf of the executive committee.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE B. COLE, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN V. L. FINDLAY,
House of Representatives.

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Speaker, the people of this country have made up their minds that political offices are henceforth to be strictly separated from offices of administration. Political offices are filled by the time-honored principles of the canvass and the election. To fill offices of administration three conditions are necessary: first, that the applicants for such office shall show their probable fitness for the duties; secondly, that the heads of Departments shall be held to strict responsibility for the conduct of their subordinates; and thirdly, as a corollary of this responsibility of heads of Departments, that those heads should have essentially the power of removal of subordinates who do not do their duty. Now, the civil-service act (so called) supplies the first of these conditions by saying how persons may be admitted to the service. What we wish to provide now is a law that shall make heads of Departments strictly and rigidly accountable and responsible, and shall give them, therefore, the power of removal. The present act which limits the tenure of certain officers to four years interferes with this power, because it has come to be the custom that when a man is put in for four years, unless his conduct is egregiously bad, he shall be continued there. Remove this and restore us to the state of our fathers in the time of Washington and the three succeeding Presidents, and you have a power vested in the superior officers of the Government under their responsibility to the people to remove those officers under them who do not do their duty. So that instead of establishing a life-tenure it on the contrary gives the utmost freedom of removal, but with the responsibility of the administering officer to the people.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LYMAN. I have only three minutes; otherwise I should be delighted to do so. How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. LYMAN. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HERBERT. I desire to ask this simple question: Does not the tenure-of-office act give it into the power of a hostile Senate practically to prohibit a President from removing officers?

Mr. LYMAN. I think it does, sir; but we propose before long to repeal that act, and I hope the gentleman will assist us in doing so. [Applause.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. Why not repeal that law first?

Mr. LYMAN. This is the stepping-stone to it.

I was about to say in conclusion that this act is working in the right direction of perfecting the reforms in our civil-service system that are so loudly demanded. And I cannot help saying, standing here in my place on this floor, that in my judgment neither party in this House can afford to vote against this bill.

I now yield one minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE].

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, in one minute much cannot be said; but I want to emphathize one proposition, and that is this: that gentlemen who vote against this bill vote for the spoils-system in politics, and gentlemen who vote for this bill vote for good administration in governmental affairs and against the spoils system in politics. That is the simple, plain, unadulterated issue presented to Congress by this bill, and no amount of equivocation about the tenure-of-office act or any other act is going to cover up and hide that issue from the American people. For the purpose of making this bill acceptable to the Democratic party in this House, a proviso was put into it which excludes the present occupants of office from its effect.

Mr. KASSON. Why was it necessary to do that?

Mr. BAYNE. And now if there be a Democrat on this floor who will not vote for the bill it is because he is against the principle and in favor of the spoils system as against the other system; because the only objection which he might raise against the bill is entirely obviated by the proviso to which I have referred.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not authorized to make any such statement. Here is one Democrat who will vote against the bill, and who does not favor the spoils system either.

Mr. BAYNE. You plant yourself as a Democrat for or against the spoils system by your vote on this bill.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. The gentleman has no right to speak for or lecture this side of the House. We do not want any of his lectures.

Mr. McMILLIN. Especially from one of the authors of the spoils system.

Mr. WELLER. The whole system is undemocratic and unrepublican both. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate upon this question has expired. The question is upon suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. MUTCHLER. Upon this question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 99, nays 146, not voting 77; as follows:

Mr. CURTIN with Mr. STRUBLE, for this day.

Mr. HILL with Mr. OCHILTREE, for to-day.

Mr. KING with Mr. MCCOID, on this vote.

Mr. BELMONT with Mr. THOMAS, for to-day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] asks leave to print some additional remarks on the bill upon which the House has just voted.

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that leave be given to all gentlemen who desire to print remarks on that bill to do so.

Objection was made.

BUREAU OF NAVIGATION.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am instructed by the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests to move to suspend the rules and discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3056) to constitute a bureau of navigation in the Treasury Department, and to pass the same as amended by the committee, and as further amended on their recommendation by striking out sections 4 and 5 from the printed bill.

Mr. KASSON. Let the Clerk read the bill as it is proposed to pass it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill as if the amendments proposed by the committee were incorporated in it.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be in the Department of the Treasury of the United States a bureau of navigation, under the immediate charge of a commissioner of navigation.

SEC. 2. That the commissioner of navigation, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have general superintendence of the commercial marine and merchant seamen of the United States, so far as vessels and seamen are not, under existing laws, subject to the supervision of any other officer of the Government. He shall be specially charged with the decision of all questions relating to the issue of registers, enrollments, and licenses of vessels, and to the filing and preserving of those documents; and wherever in title 48 or 50 of the Revised Statutes any of the above-named documents are required to be surrendered or returned to the Register of the Treasury, such requirement is hereby repealed, and such documents shall be surrendered and returned to the commissioner of navigation. Said commissioner shall have charge of all similar documents now in the keeping of the Register of the Treasury, and shall perform all the duties hitherto devolved upon said Register relating to navigation.

SEC. 3. That the commissioner of navigation shall be charged with the supervision of the laws relating to the admeasurement of vessels, and the assigning of signal letters thereto, and of designating their official number; and on all questions of interpretation growing out of the execution of the laws relating to these subjects, and relating to the collection of tonnage tax, and to the refund of such tax when collected erroneously or illegally, his decision shall be final.

SEC. 4. That the commissioner of navigation shall annually prepare and publish a list of vessels of the United States belonging to the commercial marine, specifying the official number, signal letters, names, rig, tonnage, home port, and place and date of building of every vessel, distinguishing in such list sailing vessels from such as may be propelled by steam or other motive power. He shall also report annually to the Secretary of the Treasury the increase of vessels of the United States, by building or otherwise, specifying their number, rig, and motive power. He shall also investigate the operations of the laws relative to navigation, and annually report to the Secretary of the Treasury such particulars as may, in his judgment, admit of improvement or may require amendment.

SEC. 5. That the commissioner of navigation shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be empowered to change the names of vessels of the United States, under such restrictions as may have been or shall be prescribed by act of Congress.

SEC. 6. That the commissioner of navigation shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive a salary of $4,000 per annum. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to transfer from existing bureaus or divisions of the Treasury one clerk, to be designated as deputy commissioner of navigation, to act with the full powers of said commissioner during his temporary absence from his official duty for any cause, and such additional clerks as he may consider necessary to the successful operation of the Bureau of Navigation, without impairing the efficiency of the bureaus or divisions whence such clerks may be transferred.

SEC. 7. That this act shall be in force and take effect on and after July 1, 1884.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered in order that an explanation may be given of the bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill is unanimously reported from the Shipping Committee, and is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. It constitutes in the Treasury Department a bureau of navigation, or practically consolidates the duties that are now performed by divers officers in that Department so as to bring them in one bureau under one efficient head, similar in its general functions to the British board of trade.

Under existing laws the supervision of the merchant marine and of all of the interests which attach to it is distributed in various bureaus and divisions and among different officials in the Treasury Department. So much of the supervision of the merchant marine as relates to the registration, the licensing, and the enrollment of vessels is by an old law, passed in 1792, in the office of the Register of the Treasury. This officer is a financial officer, and has no connection appropriately with the duties that relate to the enrollment, the licensing, and the registering of vessels. All the duties which relate to the administration of the tonnage tax and to the admeasurement of vessels are placed, not by law but by an order of the Treasury Department, in the so-called tonnage division. All of those matters relating to our merchant marine that affect the naming and the change of names of vessels of the merchant marine are in the Bureau of Statistics. With this divided responsibility, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury in his last report, there is no official under our Government who feels charged with the administration and the care of the laws relating to the merchant marine of the country. The Secretary of the Treasury therefore recommends, and the committee are united in approving the recommendation, that there be established in the Treasury Department a bureau similar in many respects to the British board of trade which has charge of the British merchant marine, with a head who shall be amply fitted by experience and by ability to direct affairs relating to our merchant marine, to suggest to Congress needed amendments of all antiquated shipping laws, and in general to take that charge of the merchant marine of this country that the president of the British board of trade takes of the British merchant marine.

The expense provided by this bill is simply $4,000. It provides that there shall be appointed by the President, with the approval of the Senate, a commissioner of navigation, who of course should be a man versed in admiralty law, a man thoroughly acquainted with the shipping interests of the country and their wants, and who shall feel himself charged with watching those interests and making such recommendations to Congress as their vast importance demands.

The bill provides that all the assistants and all the clerks in the bureau shall be simply transferred from the existing office of the Register of the Treasury, where some of the duties are now performed, from the division of tonnage, where some others are performed, and from the Bureau of Statistics, where still others are performed, making the expense of creating this whole bureau only $4,000 per year. And I may add, too, that the creation of this bureau is asked by the New York Shipping Association, by the boards of trade of Boston, of New York, of Philadelphia, and by all the commercial ports of the country.

I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX, of New York. This bill looks in the direction of creating another bureau. I am not partial to bureaus. I do not want this Government to become a bureaucracy. [Laughter.] That is good language.

We passed a bill last Saturday creating a bureau in the interest of labor. We have a Bureau of Agriculture, we have a Bureau of Education. We are having all sorts of bureaus. But this bureau is not intended as a novelty. It is simply a consolidation of three separate offices or departments in the Treasury under one administrative head, and it is not a removal from the Treasury of the general supervision.

Under the present law, as you know, the Register of the Treasury, a financial officer, by some curious arrangement of earlier days, has taken charge of the registers and enrollments and licenses of vessels. The navigation division has the administration of all the laws as to the admeasurement of vessels and as to the tonnage of vessels. And as to the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, we know that he furnishes a list of the vessels from time to time and such advice as he chooses to give us. I am not partial, Mr. Speaker, generally to any advice coming from these bureaus of a political and partisan character. I would have their reports be a collection and collation of facts, not a statement of inferences. We can draw inferences ourselves when we are making the law.

The Secretary of the Treasury aks us to put together in one unity these three various departments under him. He bases that recommendation on the happy results which have sprung in England from the consolidation of various offices under various maritime and other statutes by the act "for transferring from the admiralty to the board of trade certain powers and duties relative to harbors and navigation under local and other acts, and for other purposes." This law passed the English Parliament on the 29th of July, 1862, and it put in one body all the various laws, local and otherwise, of the realm of England relating to these subjects, and since that time the board of trade has been one of the great utilizing processes for the enlargement and success of British commerce.

I think the same result would follow from the passage of this bill into law, if it shall be properly administered, as I hope it will be, under proper guards and with due caution. I hope the time will come when we will do as Great Britain has done, get rid of the barbaric, old-fashioned, miserable navigation laws—of the inhibition against our people buying their ships where they please and having a free registry for them. Although I do not expect that any such law as that will pass this House at this session, I trust that under the advice given by intelligent men in a bureau unconfusedly collecting these facts we may in time have the same benefits accruing to our maritime laws as have accrued to Great Britain under the amelioration of her old barbaric system.

Many MEMBERS. "Vote!" "Vote!"

Mr. DINGLEY. If the House is ready to vote I am willing that the question shall be now taken.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] that the rules be suspended so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3056) to constitute a bureau of navigation in the Treasury Department, and to pass the same with the amendments as read.

The question was taken by a viva voce vote, and the Speaker announced that two-thirds appeared to have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ays 95, noes 16.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DINGLEY and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think we should have the yeas and nays on this proposition.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 29 in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. Those voting in favor of ordering the yeas and nays are more than one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. ELLIS. I call for the count on the other side.

The negative vote was then taken, and there were 98.

So (more than one-fifth voting in favor thereof) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 168, nays 47, not voting 107; as follows:

At the conclusion of the roll-call,

Mr. DINGLEY said: I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. BALLENTINE with Mr. STEPHENSON, until further notice.

Mr. SMALLS (having voted). I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired on all questions with the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. GIBSON.

Mr. DIBBLE. I am paired with Mr. KEAN, of New Jersey; but being assured that if present he would vote for this proposition, I have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I was absent from the House and in the committee-room by consent of the House at the time my name was called. I desire to vote in the affirmative on this proposition.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House the request of the gentleman to vote can not be submitted. His statement will appear in the RECORD.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the members of the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests, reporting the bill just passed, have leave to print in the RECORD such remarks as they may desire to submit upon this proposition.

Mr. DEUSTER. And I ask the same privilege for myself.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly.

PENSIONS.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay to move to suspend the rules and pass, with the amendment which I send to the desk, the bill (H. R. 6535) to regulate the granting of pensions in certain cases.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That every person specified in the several classes enumerated in the pension laws of the United States, who served in the field in the military or naval service, in any war in which the United States has been engaged, for a period of three months or more, and has an honorable discharge and is not receiving a pension, or a greater pension than that provided for herein, but who, by reason of any wound, injury, or disease which there is probable cause to believe originated in said service in line of duty, and not the result of his own misconduct or bad habits, or other known cause occurring since such service, is now disabled, in whole or in part, for procuring his subsistence by manual labor, shall, upon making due proof of the facts, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the proper authority, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be placed upon the list of pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive a pension, during the continuance of such disability, at a rate proportionate to the degree thereof; the true physical condition of the claimant to be ascertained and certified as provided by law upon examination by a competent board of surgeons duly appointed; such pension to commence at the date of filing the application therefor. And any person who has filed, or may hereafter file, an application for a pension under the act of July 14, 1862, and acts amendatory thereto, or under any act entitling him to arrears, may, by a declaration over his own signature, attested before any officer duly authorized to administer oaths for general purposes, elect to prosecute his said claim under this act, which election shall be final; and in such case his pension, if allowed, shall begin from the date of filing such declaration of election.

SEC. 2. That in considering the claims of dependent parents the fact and cause of death, and the fact that the soldier left no widow or minor children, having been shown as required by law, it shall be necessary only to show by competent and sufficient evidence that such parent or parents are without other present means of support than their own manual labor, or the contributions of others not legally bound for their support.

SEC. 3. That in all applications under the general pension laws, including this act, where it appears by record evidence that the applicant was regularly enlisted and mustered into the service, and served for a period of three months or more, that fact shall be sufficient prima facie evidence that he was then in good health and free from the disease or cause of disability for which he claims a pension; but such evidence shall be subject to rebuttal by record or other positive evidence of the prior existence of such disease or cause of disability.

The amendment proposed by the committee was read, as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

"Provided, That no agent, attorney, or other person shall demand or receive any fee for his services in any pension claim arising under this act until the payment of the pension, and not exceeding $10 in amount."

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded on the motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I demand a second.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rose for the purpose of making that demand, in order simply that the bill may be explained.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I hope it will be agreed by unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the motion to suspend the rules will be considered as seconded.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules there are now thirty minutes allowed for debate—fifteen minutes in favor of the motion to suspend the rules, and fifteen minutes against it.

Mr. THOMPSON. Before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] begins his remarks I would like to ask him about how much it is estimated this bill will take out of the Treasury.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will try to explain that before I get through.

Mr. Speaker, probably few subjects respecting which Congress is called upon to legislate are surrounded with greater difficulties than the subject of pensions. What these difficulties are all who have given careful consideration to the matter well understand. This fact is also evidenced by the large number of bills relating to every phase of the question that has been referred by the House to the committee reporting this bill. That there should be, moreover, a wide diversity of opinion as to legislation on this subject is not surprising.

The committee to which the several bills to which I have alluded were referred has had them under consideration for many weeks, devoting to them session after session. It has heard delegates representing various organizations of Union soldiers. It has had before it the Commissioner of Pensions during several of its sessions. It has considered, reconsidered, and discussed the subject in all its phases, and now unanimously recommends the passage of this bill in lieu of various others referred to the committee by the House.

In the preparation of this bill the committee kept in view two things: first, the just rights of the soldier; secondly, the necessity of adhering to a line of safe and consistent public policy—a policy consistent on the one hand with the obligations of the Government to its defenders, and on the other a policy safe to be followed as a precedent in any future war. The bill may not go as far as many may desire or think we ought to go in our legislation, while others will doubtless think it goes much too far; but it is believed that on a careful examination of all its provisions it will be found to be a sufficient remedy for the evils complained of in the workings of the present laws, and at the same time to be so guarded that only those justly entitled to pensions can obtain them under this act. It allows pensions for disability only, but recognizes the principle that disability incurred in the service in line of duty entitles the soldier to a pension as a right. With this principle in view the committee decided that it would not report favorably a measure granting pensions for any other cause than disability—disability incurred in the military service in the line of duty.

But it is a well-known fact that there are a large number of soldiers scattered over the country who are suffering under various degrees of disability believed to have originated in the service who are unable to procure the pensions due them from the Government, due them as a right, due them as compensation for disability, because now, twenty years after the war, they are unable to furnish the evidence required by the Department under existing law. They have become separated from their comrades, surgeons whose evidence is required are dead, officers are out of reach, hospital records are missing. The evidence required is not accessible. Yet the fact of their disability is known to their neighbors and friends, and often they were among the best soldiers, but perhaps unfortunate now in not having a hospital record. There is therefore loud complaint, and Congress is petitioned daily, as every member knows, for some measure of relief. "Why can not this man," it is asked every day, "who is disabled, and we believe disabled in the service, and who was a good soldier, obtain his pension?"

Now, the principal object of this bill is to cure this evil. Its purpose, therefore, is rather to relax the rules of evidence than anything else. It does not take away from any soldier any existing right he may have. It takes in no new classes. It does not extend the provisions of the pension laws in any direction. That is not its purpose. But, as I have said, it relaxes the rules in regard to the evidence required to establish a claim. And the committee has thought that pensions under this act should not include arrears, but should date only from the filing of the claim. The bill provides also that any claimant who is unable to furnish the proof required to establish his right to a pension under the arrears act may elect to prosecute his claim under this act and receive a pension if now disabled from the date of filing such a declaration of election. There are now on file some 185,000 claims for invalid pensions. Over 100,000 of these, if the requisite proof could be furnished, would carry arrears. This bill, I say, gives to these claimants the right to elect to prosecute their claims under this act; and in that case they give up their claims for arrears and take pensions only from the date of filing such declaration.

The result of this, of course, will be to add to the number of pensioners; but instead of giving pensions with large arrears to a comparatively small number, it will give pensions to a greater number who are now suffering from actual disability and in present need.

Mr. WOLFORD. If the claim is just, if the applicant is entitled to a pension, why should he not, like other soldiers, have a pension with arrears?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. In answer to that question I will say that in many cases, while the disability had its origin in the service, it may not have developed to a pensionable degree of disability until in later years. Besides, as I have explained, the soldier is not required under this act to furnish the evidence required to procure arrears.

Mr. WOLFORD. If a man has done his duty as a soldier, and is now disabled in consequence of such service, why should not the law be as strong in his favor as in any other case?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Where a claimant can prove that the disability under which he suffers originated in the service at a given time and under given circumstances, and that it has continued as a permanent disability from that date to the present time, he is entitled under existing law to arrears if he filed his claim in time, and this bill does not take away that right.

But where we give him the benefit of presumption in some degree in his favor, and do not require the same positive proof required under the arrears act, it is believed we are going quite as far as public policy would dictate when we grant him a pension from the date of his application.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. STEELE. Is it not intended especially to benefit a class of soldiers who while they were sick felt a pride against going into hospital, and therefore may have no hospital record.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is intended especially to benefit that meritorious class who lack a hospital record to help them through, but who nevertheless are disabled.

This bill provides for pensions in cases of disability attributable to the service but where the proof required under existing law, twenty years after the war, can not be supplied. The fact of present disability is to be determined by a physical examination by a board of surgeons. If no disability exists, that is the end of the case. If disability exists in a pensionable degree, and it is shown by sufficient evidence that such disability is not the result of his own fault or any known cause since the war, but which there is sufficient reason to believe had its origin in the service, the soldier is entitled under this bill to a pension proportionate to the disability. This, it seems to me, is right, safe, and consistent. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON].

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I carefully examined this bill some days ago, and came to the conclusion it would be of very great utility in relieving cases which bear hardly on applicants for pensions, and will therefore be very desirable to be adopted.

The third section embraces the substance of the bill which I introduced, with a modification requiring three months' service before the party can take the benefit of it—that is to say, it gives the presumption of health to every man who was duly enlisted. They have added "provided he has served for three months." So far as it goes that is very beneficial. But I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he would have any objection to my asking unanimous consent of the House to add this provision, which I believe has met the approval of the other Committee on Pensions:

That any pensioner of the United States receiving a pension by virtue of any special act of Congress on account of disability incurred by him while in the military or naval service of the United States shall be entitled to increase of such pension upon the same conditions of rerating and continuance of such increase which are applicable to other pensioners under the general pension laws.

That is to say, Mr. Speaker, under the present pension law where a man has been granted a pension during the last fifteen years by special act of Congress, under the ruling of the Pension Office he can make no application for rerating although his disability may be doubled. It is admitted to be an evil by the Commissioner of Pensions, and the object is simply to put them on the same terms with the general pensioners in applying for increase of pension. If the gentleman from Ohio will not object, I will ask unanimous consent of the House to have that included in the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have no authority from the committee to accept any amendment to the pending proposition.

Mr. KASSON. I do not ask the gentleman to accept the amendment, but merely, if he will permit me, that I will ask unanimous consent of the House that that provision shall be added as an additional section to the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let the gentleman send me his amendment, and I will consider it later on.

Mr. KASSON. It is an important matter to many men who have been deprived of increase of pension to which they are entitled.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I should not like to cumber the bill with anything objectionable.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to answer the question which I propounded to him before he yields the floor further.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. My time is running, and I now yield for three minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. KASSON. My amendment certainly should be adopted, for there are many pensioners under special acts of Congress whose disability has been doubled, and they should have the same right for making application for increase of pensions that other pensioners have.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas is entitled to the floor for three minutes.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. In three minutes, Mr. Speaker, it is utterly impossible to explain a bill of this character, and yet I beg to invite the attention of members to the points of relief the bill is intended to give. It will be observed the leading idea upon which the pension laws have proceeded heretofore, namely, that the disability was incurred in the service, is not eliminated from this bill, but carefully preserved in it. No soldier is entitled to a pension under this bill who did not become entitled to it by reason of disability incurred in service in the field.

The first paragraph of the first section simply relaxes the rules of evidence on that subject. It provides substantially that the soldier who incurred a disability in the service but who has failed to make proof in support of his claim under the rules of the Pension Office is entitled to a pension on showing—what? First, that he served three months or more in the field and was honorably discharged; second, that by reason of wound, injury, or disease he is now disabled; third, that prima facie such wound, injury, or disease has not resulted from his own misconduct or bad habits or from any other known cause; and if he show these facts and it appear from the nature of the wound, injury, or disease that the disability probably originated in the service, he shall be put on the pension-rolls.

I do not believe there is any unsafe or unwise principle involved in that paragraph of the bill. It is a difficult undertaking, now that nearly twenty years have elapsed, with the many changes that have taken place in this country, to identify the disabilities incurred in the service with that service. Many diseases originating in the service developed slowly, so that actual disability was not reached for years afterward, when officers and surgeons were dead and comrades scattered. This bill does not require the positive proof identifying the origin of the disability with the service, but does require that the service be shown, that honorable discharge be had, that the disability is not the result of misconduct or vice since the service, and that the disease or injury is not inconsistent with the service, or, in other words, that it probably originated there. The committee of which I am a member thought we could safely go that far, and we believed it unwise and unsafe at this time to go further.

This paragraph of the first section was intended mainly to reach a large class of cases pending in the Pension Office, but "hung up"—if I may use that expression—for the want of the proof. I have indicated cases wherein the chief difficulty has been to identify the origin of the disability with service in the line of duty, cases where the disability is obvious, the service and honorable discharge of record; but where the origin of the disability is uncertain and almost impossible to establish we ought not to be too rigid, too exacting now in cases of this character.

Mr. BLAND. Can the gentleman from Arkansas state the number of applicants of that class?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I will state to the gentleman from Missouri very frankly that so far as I am individually concerned I have made no inquiry upon that subject whatever. But the distinguished chairman of the committee, I understand, will give you that information in his closing remarks.

But to continue. This bill will facilitate the class of cases I have mentioned as pending in the Pension Office. But, on the other hand, the second paragraph of the first section limits the first pargraph in this, namely, that only those shall have the benefit of this act who apply under it; and if they apply under it, which they may do by so noting in their application, then the pension dates from the filing of the application under this act. So that if now and then it facilitates the granting of an unmeritorious claim, at all events it goes to a soldier, and to one now so disabled as to be unable to earn support by manual labor. In addition to this, it takes from all, however meritorious, any pension for any period of time prior to making application under the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I am aware that my time is about up. I regret I could not have the time to do either the bill or myself justice. I bear testimony to the earnestness and labor the committee gave the bill in the hope that it might meet the approbation of this body, and to some extent the demands of the soldier element of the country which clamors for a relaxation of the iron rules of evidence heretofore obtaining in the Pension Office. It is due myself to say that I did not intend until a few moments ago, at the request of the distinguished chairman of the committee that reported the bill and who has felt so much solicitude about its passage, to speak at all. I close by saying the last two sections, like the one I have discussed, briefly and poorly I know, have my unqualified assent.

Mr. BLAND. Then I understand the gentleman to say that he does not know the number of cases now pending to be affected by this bill.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I stated frankly that I did not know the number, and, so far as I am personally concerned, I will say further to the gentleman, courteously of course, that I am entirely indifferent on that point. If the bill is based on correct principles and sound policy it ought to pass; if not, it should be defeated, and in either event without reference to the number of soldiers affected by it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I now yield two minutes of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GREENLEAF].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GREENLEAF. Mr. Speaker, I am glad of the opportunity given me to emphasize what our respected chairman of the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay has said, as well as what has been said by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Arkansas, with regard to the merits of the bill now under consideration, as well as what has been said with regard to the attention that has been bestowed upon the bill in committee. As an unpretending yet conscientious worker on that committee, I can say of my own knowledge, and do say, that the committee have expended much time and labor in the consideration of this bill, and have given to it their best thought in the confident hope and expectation that it would merit the approbation of the friends of the soldier as well as the friends of the country on both sides of the House, and pass the House without waste of valuable time or that unpleasant friction which has sometimes attended the passage of less important bills heretofore.

Our worthy chairman has stated to you that this bill meets the approval of the Commissioner of Pensions, and I presume no member of the House would question his unsupported statement of this fact, yet in order to make assurance doubly sure I waited upon the Commissioner of Pensions in person this morning, and asked him for his indorsement of the measure over his own signature. I have his indorsement of the bill here, and will ask the Clerk to read it. The paper was signed in my own presence, and will speak for itself.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 21, 1884.

MY DEAR SIR: In response to your request that I should examine House bill 6535, reported April 11 by the chairman of your committee, and to state whether in my judgment the provisions of that bill are practicable and susceptible of such administration as will tend to obviate some of the difficulties experienced in the administration of existing laws, by which those who have rendered efficient and arduous service to the Government in the field, and who are now disabled and unable to make the necessary proof to connect the same with the service, and as regards claims of dependent parents, and the rule of evidence contained in the third section of the bill, I have the honor to say that in my judgment the bill is a most important step in the right direction, and while not going to the extent with regard to invalid pensions which I think warranted by public opinion and justice to claimants, yet I believe it is just in its provisions and susceptible of such administration as will work justice to many worthy claimants now excluded.

As I stated in my conference with the committee on the 16th of February, I think there is a necessity for some such legislation, and I rejoice that this bill has been introduced, and trust that it will meet with favorable consideration.

Very respectfully,

W. W. DUDLEY, Commissioner.

Hon. H. S. GREENLEAF,
Committee on Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay,
House of Representatives.

I presumed to ask for this letter, Mr. Speaker, believing that most if not all the members of the House who have had occasion to do business with the Pension Office have confidence in the ability, integrity, and judgment of the present Commissioner of Pensions in such matters as pertain to his office, and that they would be disposed to respectfully consider anything he might be willing to say upon so important a pension bill as we now have before us.

Mr. WHITING. Mr. Speaker, it is not the object of this bill to add another class to those who are receiving the benefit of the pension laws, but the intention is to enable those who are now entitled to a pension to have their names placed on the roll. It may seem a very simple thing to do that under existing law, but any one who has had experience at the Pension Office knows that it is not. In all cases the burden is imposed upon the claimant of looking up the comrades and officers who are to establish by their testimony his right to a pension. This may seem an easy task, but when you remember that it is nearly twenty years since the close of the war, and that many of these officers and soldiers have died or removed to a distant part of the country, or it may be that the soldier himself has removed to a distance from the place where he enlisted, the difficulty in procuring the necessary evidence is obvious. In many cases it is impossible to obtain it at any expense, even when the greatest diligence is exercised.

Again, most of the veterans are poor and have little knowledge of how to prepare a case; and the insufficiency of the fee allowed to an attorney is little inducement for him to devote very much time to securing the necessary evidence. The consequence is that, after several vain attempts to satisfy all of the requirements of the present law, the soldier gives up in despair and plods on in poverty and misery, with a keen sense of the injustice that has been done him. To secure a pension under the existing laws it is necessary to prove, first, no unsoundness at the time of entering the service; second, disability incurred in the service and its continuance down to the time of applying for the pension. Those who have had experience in administering the law are of the opinion that great injustice is done the soldier by too exacting and practically prohibitory rules of evidence in the enforcement of these provisions of the law. We may have the strongest reasons for believing that the foundation for phthisis, malarial fever, and many other diseases was laid in the service, but it is a difficult thing to prove it.

Now, the bill presented by the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay provides, in section 1, that if a soldier shall have served three months and is now disabled in whole or in part from procuring his subsistence by reason of any wound, injury, or disease, which there is probable cause to believe originated in said service, he shall be given a pension.

Section 3 provides that a service of three months shall be prima facie evidence that the applicant was free from the disease for which he claims a pension when he entered the service.

The committee do not believe that they have opened the door too wide by this bill. We have acted on the belief that it is the intention of the Government to pension every soldier who was disabled in the service and who is suffering because of that disability. We have acted on the belief that it was not intended that the proof required should be of such a kind as to exclude a large number of worthy men.

It has been our purpose to supplement previous legislation where it has been too restrictive, and to thus carry out the intention of the Government to pension every soldier disabled in the service.

We have considered this bill word by word and line by line with Commissioner Dudley, and he approves it, and we believe that it is so safe and reasonable in its provisions that every member of the House can support it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I now yield two minutes of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PEELLE].

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, on the 3d day of March I introduced into this House a bill on this subject and caused it to be referred to the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay. I desire in my own time to have the bill I then introduced read, in order that the House may see how the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay have framed the present bill, and how much of the provisions of that bill are incorporated into the bill reported by them. I will then state one of the material omissions from the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Indiana that in his judgment the bill can not be read within the two minutes.

Mr. PEELLE. Then I ask unanimous consent that it be read as far as it can be read in the time given me and that the remainder be printed in the RECORD.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill to provide pensions for certain invalid soldiers and sailors who have been discharged from the Army or Navy of the United States after six months' service therein during the war of the rebellion, and for the widows of deceased pensioners, and to increase the rate of pension in certain cases.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That every person specified in the several classes enumerated in section 4693 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the amendments thereto, who served in the military or naval service as mentioned in said section for the period of six months during the war of the rebellion, and has been honorably discharged therefrom, and who is or shall become disabled by reason of a wound, injury, or disease, not the result of his own gross carelessness, disreputable conduct, or vicious habits, shall, upon making due proof of the facts under such regulations as may be prescribed by the proper authority, be placed upon the list of pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive a pension during the continuance of such disability at a rate proportionate to the degree thereof; and such pension shall commence at the date of filing an application therefor. The highest rate of pension granted by virtue hereof shall be $24, which is hereby made divisible upon the basis of ability to perform manual labor: Provided, That no person entitled to an invalid pension under existing laws, or such as may be hereafter enacted granting pensions for disabilities contracted in the military or naval service of the United States and in line of duty, shall receive the benefits of this act. But any such applicant for invalid pension having an application therefor pending, or who shall hereafter file his application for such pension, may, by a declaration over his own signature, elect to prosecute his said claim under this act, and his pension when allowed shall commence from the date of such election.

SEC. 2. That all widows of soldiers and sailors who, as such widows, are now receiving, under existing laws or a special act of Congress, the sum of $8 per month, by reason of the death of such soldiers and sailors from a disability contracted in the military or naval service of the United States, and in line of duty, since the 4th day of March, 1861, shall, from and after this date, be entitled to and receive the rate of $12 per month in lieu of said rate of $8; and all such widows who shall hereafter be found to be entitled to the rate of $8 per month under existing laws shall be entitled to and receive the rate of $12 in lieu of said rate of $8.

SEC. 3. That if any invalid pensioner has died or shall hereafter die of a disability contracted in the line of duty during the war of the rebellion, or if any pensioner under section 1 of this act shall die leaving a widow or minor children under 16 years of age, or both, at the date of the death of such pensioner, such widow and minor children shall be held to be entitled, in the order of succession named, to an original pension in their own right, under existing laws, without being required to prove that the death cause of such pensioner was due to his military or naval service of the United States, and shall receive the rates now allowed by law, except that such as may be found to be entitled to $8 per month shall receive in lieu thereof $12 per month.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. It will be seen that the pensions of widows have been left out of the pending bill altogether.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I simply rise to enter my protest against that portion of this bill which follows the word "therefor" in line 23 of the first section. I refer to the following words:

And any person who has filed or may hereafter file an application for a pension under the act of July 14, 1862, and acts amendatory thereto, or under any act entitling him to arrears, may, by a declaration over his own signature, attested before any officer duly authorized to administer oaths for general purposes, elect to prosecute his said claim under this act, which election shall be final; and in such case his pension, if allowed, shall begin from the date of filing such declaration of election, which compels the applicant for pension to waive his rights to arrears.

This bill is in the main correct, and I shall vote for it even as it is; but I protest against so important a measure being pressed to its passage without the privilege being accorded members of amending its manifest errors. If the soldier is to receive any advantage from this act he must waive rights secured to him under the present law. In other words, in order to secure that which will relieve present poverty and distress, he must abandon his right to arrears of pension. We have been told from day to day that the committee, whose chairman [Mr. WARNER] has just spoken, were to bring out a bill affording the relief so plainly demanded by the country's defenders. I submit, sir, if they do not signally fail. True, they give, but they withhold also; indeed in some things they take back from the soldier that which he already hath. It is an ungracious proceeding, and unworthy men now enjoying the heritage perpetuated by the blood and suffering of these pensioners. It is a question whether they would not be more injured than benefited by this bill. In the hope, however, that the Senate will properly amend, I give it my vote.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD].

Mr. LAIRD. I wish to emphasize the objection of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN] to so much of the first section of the bill as he called attention to, and to say that the gentlemen of this committee have shown to the soldier that mercy which requires him to relieve a supposedly honest claim against this Government for more money, namely, his claim for arrears, than he can receive during a lifetime of reward under the provisions of the act. It is the same kind of mercy to the ex-soldier of this country that this Government showed to those who were dying in Andersonville under its policy; and the committee refuses to report a bill to recognize the services and the sufferings of those men in the death-holes of the South.

There is another objection to the bill. If you seek to put it in the way of these men to receive their rights, you ought to add this sort of a section: that in all cases where the applicant for a pension is shown to have rendered three months' service or more in the field all injuries sustained by him when in the service shall be presumed to have been received by him in the line of duty, and the burden of the proof to the contrary shall be on the Government. You have made a provision under which the Pension Office to-day are refusing pensions to thousands of men who justly deserved them; the provision, namely, that they must establish their soundness on their entry into the service; and you are refusing to adopt the other provision that they shall be assumed to have received their injuries in the line of duty if they are shown to have rendered three months' active service.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The objection I have to this bill is that it restricts rather than enlarges the pension-roll. The first section provides that if it shall appear probable that the applicant received the disability in the military service, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions to put him on the pension-roll. Why, sir, if I understand the law that is the rule now. If from the evidence it appears probable, if the weight of the evidence is that he has incurred a disability in the military service, it is the duty of the Commissioner to put the applicant on the pension-roll. But this restricts it in this, that he shall not only prove that he has incurred the disability in the military service of the United States, but he shall also show that he served three months before he is entitled to the pension.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is a matter of record.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes, sir. But now if he were to serve but a day and he shows by the evidence it is probable he has incurred the disability in the service, he is entitled to a pension.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This does not take away any right.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I say the present pension law simply requires the applicant to show by a preponderance of evidence the probability that he has incurred the disability in the field, and he is entitled to a pension, though he may have served but a day or a week. But this bill requires, before he shall be pensioned for disability incurred in the service, that he must have had an honorable service for at least three months.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. We have now a very liberal pension system. This bill proposes to further liberalize it. Under our present pension system every man who can prove that he incurred a disability, either from disease or wounds contracted in the line of duty in the service, and was honorably discharged, is entitled to a pension. That is the law as it now stands, and the proof of these facts is made under the law. The proof is taken by ex parte affidavits. The Government is not represented in the taking of those affidavits. And if the party can not prove to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Pensions by ex parte affidavits that he contracted the disease or was wounded in the line of duty in the military service of the country it seems to me he ought not to have a pension at all.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Did the gentleman not vote the other day to put on the pension-roll men not disabled at all?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Ah! that was a different thing. When twenty years more have expired and you present such a bill for your Union soldiers as I voted for on behalf of the Mexican soldiers you will find me supporting it. But that is not the question, Mr. Speaker.

What does this bill do? It says that by ex parte affidavits all you have got to do is to make out a probable case. Now, gentlemen who have opposed this bill on the ground of the alteration it makes in the law in that respect are very much mistaken in the view they have taken of it. It is in fact a liberalization of the law in that respect. How easy will it be for parties under ex parte affidavits to make out a probable case, showing that they were disabled in the service. There is no telling how many men this will put on the pension-roll. I do not want you to be deceived in that respect.

The second section has no reference to the proof, but is an extension of the pension laws. Under the present law, if a father or a mother can show his or her son volunteered, that he or she was dependent on that son for support, and that son left no widow or minor children, then the father or mother would be entitled to a pension on proof of those facts. But, Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes that if the mother or the father can show that they are a day without the means of support, dependent in the least degree on the son, and that son died in the service and left no widow or minor children, these dependent parents shall receive a pension. It is a clear extension of the pension laws.

Mr. BEACH. Is not that right?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It is a clear extension of the pension laws.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Allow me to suggest that there is a further extension in this: this bill does not require the applicant to show even that he is not able to earn a living for himself, as will be seen by reference to the provisions of that section.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It does not matter how able the applicant may be to earn a support for himself by manual labor. All that he has to show is that he is without other means of support, whether he was dependent at all or not upon the son who volunteered and was killed in the service.

Mr. WOLFORD. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Not now; I have not time. When I get through, if I have time, I will do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute of his time remaining.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The third section of this bill is a proper section, and I would support it heartily if it stood alone. I have always believed that when the Government received a soldier in the service and that soldier performed faithful duty the Government should be estopped from denying that when that soldier volunteered and entered the service he was a sound and healthy man.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Permit me to say to the gentleman that I intend to vote for this bill simply because of that third section.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I do not think the gentleman need vote for the bill on that ground, for we will have an opportunity hereafter of supporting a proper bill which will include the provisions of this third section.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] if he has any time remaining?

The SPEAKER. The time allowed under the rule for debate has been exhausted.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I dislike to trespass on the House, but I wish to have unanimous consent to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] who has charge of this bill what the demands of the bill will cost the Treasury. I think the House ought to be permitted to know that, and I think it is willing to know it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. No man can estimate that.

The SPEAKER. The House has heard the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. STEELE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the regular order is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I should be glad to answer the question if permitted to do so.

Mr. KASSON. In pursuance of what was said a little while ago, understanding that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] withdraws his objection, I desire that a very brief section of six lines may be added to this bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If the House is not willing to have information on this question I do not think there should be any additions put on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman objects?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Did not the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] reserve three or four minutes of his time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has occupied all his time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I supposed that I had two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no time remaining.

Mr. MATSON. I desire to ask unanimous consent of the House, not of the gentleman from Ohio, to suggest an amendment to this bill.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen have objected to the offering of amendments.

Mr. MATSON. I ask permission to state the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can do so, if there is no objection.

Mr. MATSON. It is to add to the first section the following:

And the rate for total disability under this section shall be $24 per month, which is made divisible in proportion to the degree of disability; and no account shall be taken of rank in the service in granting pensions under this section.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If that request is acceded to will we then have fifteen minutes' more debate on each side?

The SPEAKER. There will be no further debate.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would inquire why there should be a discrimination in regard to rating pensions under this bill?

Mr. BLAND. I have called for the regular order, and insist upon it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I ask to have read a very short letter from the Commissioner of Pensions; I think there will be no objection to that.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I object.

Mr. WELLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. Will it be proper for me at this time to request the gentleman from Ohio to admit the following amendment——

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded on all sides of the House.

Mr. WELLER. Can I be permitted to have it printed in the RECORD?

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to all these requests. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to suspend the rules and pass the bill, with the amendments which have been read.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 111, noes 41.

Mr. THOMPSON and Mr. PETERS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 165, nays 57, not voting 100; as follows:

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill was agreed to.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. BARKSDALE with Mr. ANDERSON, on the pending bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Minnesota, with Mr. TALBOTT, for this day.

Mr. FORAN with Mr. WADSWORTH, until further notice.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, with Mr. MONEY, for this day.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. CHACE, until further notice.

Mr. PAIGE with Mr. HANCOCK. If present, Mr. PAIGE would vote "ay" on this question.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certain members of the committee and one or two other gentlemen, including the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], desire leave to print in the RECORD remarks on the bill just passed. I ask that leave to print be granted to such gentlemen as may desire it.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked for leave to print in the RECORD remarks on the bill just passed. The Chair hears no objection; and leave is granted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill by the following title:

A bill (H. R. 3931) to create an additional United States judicial district, and to establish circuit and district courts therein, in the State of Alabama.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

A bill (S. 351) for the relief of Alexander Smiley;

A bill (S. 830) for the relief of John Frasier;

A bill (S. 139) for the relief of the trustees of the Southern Illinois Normal University at Carbondale, Jackson County, Illinois; and Joint resolution (S. R. 38) authorizing the issue of clothing to Sergeant Herman Theune, Company I, Twenty-third United States Infantry.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BAGLEY. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion, there were—ayes 66, noes 91.

Mr. BAGLEY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion was not agreed to.

ADULTERATED FOOD AND DRUGS.

Mr. BEACH. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Health to move to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Health be, and it hereby is, authorized to inquire into the extent and character of the adulterated food and drugs imported into the United States or exported therefrom; and to this end the said committee is authorized to send for persons and papers and to sit during the recess, if in its judgment it be necessary in the proper execution of this inquiry; and the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House to defray the expenses of the said inquiry.

Mr. MILLS. I demand a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. BEACH. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. MILLS. Oh, no; I object to that.

Mr. BEACH and Mr. MILLS were appointed tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 93, noes 51.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules debate is now in order for thirty minutes—fifteen minutes in support of the motion to suspend the rules, and fifteen minutes in opposition to it.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, the object of this investigation is to gather facts upon which to formulate such legislation as may be necessary to check the evils resulting from our foreign commerce in adulterated commodities. The proposed inquiry relates solely to exports and imports. There is no intention to investigate adulterations in the States or the commerce in adulterated articles between the States. We propose simply, in the language of the resolution, to inquire into "the extent and character of the adulterated food and drugs imported into the United States or exported therefrom."

The subject, Mr. Speaker, is one of very great importance. It is particularly so at the present time by reason of the attitude assumed by foreign governments. I trust that I may have the attention of the House for a few moments so that we may get an intelligent vote on this proposition.

A few days since I found in the New York Herald the following article:

[By cable to the Herald.]

LONDON, March 31, 1884.

In the House of Commons to-day Right Hon. George J. Dobson, chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, replying to Mr. Thomas Duckham, Liberal member for Herefordshire, said that the foreign office had been instructed to obtain information from America regarding the importation into England of American adulterated butter and cheese.

The reading of this article suggested to my mind that probably England had in contemplation a course of action towards American dairy products similar to that which France and Germany have pursued toward our hog products. If my suspicions are well founded the urgency of the inquiry sought by this resolution is apparent. It will not do for us to abide the results of the English investigation. Commercial honesty as well as regard for the interests of our farmers and dairymen require that we ourselves should embark upon the investigation, and if we find, as I feel confident we shall, that there is just cause for the complaint, Congress should at once so regulate our foreign commerce in butter and cheese, and in fact all other articles which are the subject of adulteration, that the spurious article may be detected and not come in deceptive competition with the genuine.

In this matter of butter and cheese the statistics will justify the present action of England. We find in the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics the facts in relation to our exportations of butter and cheese.

In the year 1880 we exported butter to the value of $6,690,687. In 1881 it was about the same, or to be exact $6,256,024. In 1882 it suddenly dropped to $2,864,570, and in 1883 it fell off to $2,290,665.

Our exportation of cheese for the year 1881 was valued at $16,380,248, and in 1882 at $14,058,975. In 1883 it dwindled to $11,134,526.

These are indeed startling facts, and it behooves us to inquire into the cause of this great decrease in the exportation of our dairy products. It is openly charged that the decline is owing to the spurious butter and cheese which have taken the place of the genuine article.

Upon consulting Mr. Nimmo, the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, to ascertain, if I could, the cause, I found that during the year 1881 we exported close on to four million dollars' worth of oleomargarine butter. In 1882 the exportation of this imitation butter fell off to $308,427, but in its stead we shipped abroad an entirely new article of commerce, called oleomargarine (the oil), to the value of $2,666,197. In 1883 we shipped of this oil $4,143,748. This oil was exported to Holland and other countries to be manufactured into butter.

I inquired of Mr. Nimmo whether the article exported under the name of "butter" was genuine or in part spurious. He said he was unable to tell, that even the customs officers could not tell, for under a decision of the Attorney-General they had no right to break packages for the purpose of inspection. He furthermore said that nothing but a thorough investigation would reach the facts, and he deemed such an investigation of great importance.

The same remarks will apply to cheese. Public attention has been directed mainly to the adulterations of butter, but cheese is adulterated in an equally villainous way. They have a sort of emulsifying process whereby lard is injected. The value of the adulterated article is far inferior to that of the genuine and it is supposed to be detrimental to health. It is charged that we are exporting large quantities of this adulterated cheese, and it is openly asserted that the decline of five millions which occurred during the last year in our exportation of cheese is owing to the sensitiveness of foreign markets upon this subject of adulterations. This is a matter the committee proposes to investigate, and at the same time it proposes to ascertain to what extent England is sending us adulterated cheese. Our importation of foreign cheese during the last year was valued at about $1,000,000. That much of it was adulterated is publicly asserted. In proof of the assertion I may read an article I cut from the New York World of last Friday:

Dr. Bartley, the chemist of the Brooklyn health department, has adopted a method of determining the deleteriousness of suspected edibles that surpasses the most critical analysis in reliability. A man having complained that "English dairy" cheese was prejudicially adulterated, Dr. Bartley was directed by his department to make an analysis. He pooh-poohed the idea, and to prove that it was all a matter of imagination ate some of it. It made him so ill that he had to prescribe for himself. This testimony is worth more than a thousand whitewashing certificates.

Now, while England is investigating the adulterated cheese which it is alleged is shipped to that country from America I think it is well for us to profit by her example and inquire into the adulterated cheese which England is sending over to us.

We might also look into the adulterations which are practiced in the manufacture of lard by the intermixture of tallow, and we would probably ascertain the reason why our exportations of lard, which were valued in 1881 at over $34,000,000, fell in 1883 to about twenty-four million, a decline of ten millions in two years.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that in the few moments allowed for this debate I can not take up and consider the various adulterated articles which enter into our foreign commerce. Those who have given the subject but little attention have no conception of the extent to which these adulterations prevail. Among our exports we find the principal adulterations to be in butter, lard, and cheese. There are others, however, to which public attention has not yet been called, but which will be brought to light by the labors of this committee. Why, only last night, in glancing over the February number of the consular reports issued by the State Department, I find that Consul Tanner, the consul at Liege and Verviers, writes under date of 6th November last in regard to petroleum, of which we exported last year about forty-five million dollars' worth, as follows:

Petroleum is imported into this consular district from Antwerp. It comes here to the wholesale dealers, and from them to the retail. Now, I am confident in my own mind that if petroleum is adulterated it is not done in the United States, and it looks, from the fact of the complaints in this instance coming from the retail dealers here, that it is doctored before it reaches their hands. By whom or when it is doctored is no business of mine, so that it is not done in the United States, and this brings me to the point. I respectfully ask the Department to have me supplied with a statement as to the quality and general condition, &c., of petroleum, such as we export for general use to Belgium, in order to vindicate our dealers from all suspicion of unfairness and adulterations.

If I can succeed in doing this by the aid of the Department, I am sure that it will redound greatly to the interest of American exporters in many other articles, and will go far toward removing prejudices here against other of our products.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call attention to the principal articles of import which are the subject of adulteration. During the last year we imported drugs and chemicals to the value of $43,716,090, upon which we received a duty of $6,053,574. For the same period we imported spices to the value of $2,018,630, upon which we received a duty of $873,886. In the same year we imported spirits, wine, and malt liquors to the value of $13,733,666, upon which a duty of $9,253,341 was paid. There was imported during last year of oils of all kinds $1,045,051.29, with a duty of $421,077.29. It is commonly believed that in most all of these articles which go to make up a vast commerce adulterations are practiced to a greater or less extent.

It is strange that my protectionist friends on the other side of the House have not seen before now the necessity of the action we propose to take under this resolution. They insist upon high duties to protect the American laborer against the pauper wages of Europe. They seem to have overlooked the fact that if we shut out by legislation these adulterated articles we would practically put an end to their importation. Under the existing high rate of duties foreign countries can not send us the pure article. They are obliged to resort to adulteration to compete with our home producers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if it is found upon this investigation that our exports and imports are adulterated, as is charged and commonly believed, it is obviously the duty of Congress to take some action. What that action may be remains for future consideration. The paramount duty now is to get at the facts. There are two ways in which we should look at this question. The one as it affects our duty to foreign nations with which we have commercial relations; the other as it concerns our own people and the General Government. For one, I believe that honesty and fair dealing are just as important among nations as among individuals. For this reason I would require that all exported articles should be just what they profess to be. If they are adulterated let them be so marked. We can not afford to have our commercial honesty as a nation assailed.

With regard to the duty we owe our own people in the matter of imports I think there will be no dispute. The protection of the public health is a legitimate function of the Government. We would be authorized, therefore, in prohibiting the importation of all adulterated articles which are detrimental to health, and we would be equally authorized in exacting absolute purity in the foreign drugs, upon which we have to rely for the cure of sickness.

Another legitimate function of government is to protect the people against deception, where the deception is general and can be prevented only through government action. If adulterated goods are shipped to us from abroad with a view to be sold in this country at the price of genuine goods, it is the duty of the Government to stop them at the custom-house and see that they are properly branded before they are scattered among the people.

I have an illustration in point. It is well known that we have been exporting cotton-seed in large quantities. It is publicly charged that the oil is expressed from the seed and shipped back to this country as "olive-oil." Now the difference between pure olive-oil and the adulterated article can not be detected by the great mass of consumers. It requires an expert or a chemist to distinguish the genuine from the spurious. The people, however, buy the inferior article and pay the superior price. They are robbed and plundered, and the only way to stop the deception is through Government interference.

I have only time, Mr. Speaker, to allude to one other branch of this subject, and that is a highly important one. I refer to the effects of the importation of adulterated articles upon the revenues of the Government. About thirty years ago, when England was deeply agitated upon this question, and a committee of Parliament was raised for investigation, it was estimated that the loss to the British revenues by reason of adulterations exceeded £2,000,000 annually. I have no doubt whatever in my own mind that our revenues are defrauded in a much larger sum from our foreign trade in these adulterated goods, and I am anxious to gather the facts for the information of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate in favor of the motion to suspend the rules has expired. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] is recognized to control the remaining fifteen minutes.

Mr. MILLS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS].

Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. Speaker, if, as one member, I can get nothing better in this direction than the resolution now proposed I must take that, but I protest, with all respect toward the committee and the House, that there is now pending in this House a bill introduced during the first two weeks of the session which is already far in advance in the direction in which the mover of this resolution would go—a proposition which is far beyond the point at which this resolution starts, and there I think we ought now to start. This bill was introduced in the Senate during the last Congress by Senator MILLER, of New York, and in the House by Mr. Flower, of that State. It was referred to the Committee on Commerce of this House, and my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. HORR] made an exhaustive and elaborate report upon it from that committee. That report has done more in reference to this important subject than this whole investigation can do during the brief life of the present Congress.

What is the immediate purpose of the resolution? Is it intended to call the attention of the people of the country to the adulterations of food and drugs? It does not include medicines along with foods and drugs. Why, sir, the country is already far ahead of this House in reference to this question. They are fully aroused to the need of a remedy for adulteration, and want you to apply the remedy. While we have been waiting for five months the public sentiment, as shown by the very extracts which the gentleman from New York has read from the press of the country, and by letters and personal inquiries of constituents which other gentlemen as well as myself have received, has gone already far in advance of this resolution. Is it proposed to investigate to find out whether indeed there be adulteration? Who on this floor doubts or denies it? Everybody knows it. If this House is to undertake any remedy, the bill which I hold in my hand, introduced here on the 11th of December by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL], the same bill in totidem verbis which was approved by the Committee on Commerce in the last House, and which I had intended to reintroduce because of its merits, ought to be passed instead of this tentative resolution, which will prolong investigation through the coming summer and perhaps on through the short session of Congress, when the measure must die.

There is at hand the exhaustive investigation recently had in England, and on which the adulteration-of-foods acts are based, and on which this bill is modeled.

This bill I hold in my hand protects the Territories and the District of Columbia, and indirectly the country at large, from the importation of adulterated food, medicines, and drugs. It does more than that. The State of New York, which has by legislation and investigation attempted to meet these evils, especially with respect to certain foods, has only State power and State action; but the bill I hold in my hand does that which is more important than all laws of that character either by State or national action.

This bill was referred to the Committee on Agriculture at the present Congress. It was reported favorably by the committee of the last Congress. It does what is just and philosophical. It does what is most practical. It fixes a standard to define and classify everything coming into this country. It declares, Mr. Speaker, what is a food, what is a drug, and what is a medicine. But the resolution on that table, for which I will vote if I can get nothing better, does not include medicine, and the word "drug" does not include it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I ask the gentleman from Texas to yield me two minutes longer.

Mr. MILLS. Certainly.

Mr. MCCOMAS. The bill I hold here sets forth eight different classifications for the information of the people of the country and of the officers of the States and of the several national Departments. It includes under medicine all things which are known and recognized as to strength, purity, and quality as medicines. It includes under food those things which have not been mixed or injuriously affected as to quality or strength, from which nothing has been abstracted or into which improper substances have not been injected, or to which inferior or cheaper substitutes have been added, as well as all imitations. It excludes food partly diseased or rotten, or, as in case of milk, the product of diseased animals, or anything colored, polished, or powdered whereby damage is concealed. It excludes all poisonous ingredients, or matter injurious to health. It excludes all matters like butterine, oleomargarine, and other adulterated foods, and it excludes all medicines which in an extreme moment may be given by a physician, but which may be a sham and a fraud upon the doctor and patient. All these things are provided for in the bill which I hold in my hand, and the Secretary of the Treasury is empowered to employ analysts and inspectors and to investigate, and its provisions, as well as the decisions of the Treasury Department, would go everywhere throughout the country to give correct standard to trade, to commerce and agriculture. Yet, sir, we are to be told after five months of a session of Congress, when we ought to be passing that bill approved thus by so many members of this body, we are to be content with the pending resolution, when we now and here should be taking care of the consumer throughout the land. This bill has been on the Calendar for a long time, and we ought to correct the evils which confessedly exist, for which this is a remedy. If, however, I am not permitted to vote for that bill now I must vote for the pending proposition. I should prefer, however, going far in advance and doing now fully and completely that which sooner or later we will be compelled to do.

I thank the gentleman from Texas for his courtesy.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I am not in favor of the Government interfering in the regulation of what its people eat, drink, or wear. I believe that the people of the United States are competent to determine for themselves what they ought to eat and how they will have it. I believe in that doctrine of our fathers that the people are competent to build governments and to administer them so as to take care of themselves. I do not believe the Government of the United States is inspired with any superior intelligence over the people who sent us here to make laws for them. I do not believe the Government of the United States can better determine what the people shall eat than the people can determine for themselves. Hence I am opposed to this constant interference on the part of the law-making power of the Government with the habits, food, and customs of the people at home. There is too much sumptuary legislation, as a friend has just whispered to me here.

Now, if it be wise for us to depart from this old fundamental idea in our Government and it is necessary for the Government to examine into butter or oleomargarine or whisky or anything else which enters into the consumption of the people, this is not the proper way to do it. If we are going to have an examination made about butter imported into the United States or exported to other people, the better way for us to do is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to have the investigation made at the custom-house. He can do it infinitely better than a floating committee of this House. He can have his inspectors and his experts, who can make examination of goods coming in and going out.

Suppose some butter is presented for examination before this committee, and they have an expert to pass upon it. How can he know what is coming in at New York on that day or the next day, or what is going out? The proper plan would be manifestly not to deputize the committee, but to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to take such steps as in his wisdom may be necessary to have an examination made through the custom-houses, and make his annual reports to Congress. Therefore there is no necessity for the passage of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

The question was taken. The House divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 80.

Mr. BEACH. I ask for the yeas and nays on this proposition.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 14 members voting in favor thereof.

So the resolution was not agreed to.

Mr. SCALES. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, Mr. GREEN, who is absent on account of sickness, be permitted to print some remarks on this subject.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken. The House divided; and there were—ayes 91, noes 73.

Mr. COX, of New York. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered. Mr. COX, of New York, and Mr. BLOUNT were appointed; and

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 31—noes not counted.

Mr. BLOUNT. There is manifestly a disposition not to adjourn, and I do not insist upon a further count.

So the House refused to adjourn.

DUTY ON WORKS OF ART.

Mr. HURD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. 6751) to abolish the discriminating duty on works of art the production of foreign or American artists; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Will it be in order to move that the House take a recess until half past 10 to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order. Does the gentleman desire to submit that motion?

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. At the suggestion of gentlemen around me I will withdraw the motion. My object was to permit this order of business to proceed to-morrow morning.

COMPENDIUM OF THE TENTH CENSUS, ETC.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am directed by the Committee on the Census to report the bill which I send to the desk, and ask that it be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act supplementary to "An act to provide for the publication of the Tenth Census," approved August 7, 1882.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in addition to the number of printed copies of the reports of the Tenth Census authorized by the act entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the Tenth Census," approved August 7, 1882, there shall be printed 25,000 copies of the Compendium of the Tenth Census, of which 8,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 16,000 copies for the use of the House, and 1,000 copies for the use of the Department of the Interior; that there shall also be printed and separately bound in paper covers an edition of each of the following-named monograph reports, the number of copies of each edition to be as follows, namely: Of the reports on the seal islands of Alaska, on ship-building, on the cereals, on the manufacture of glass, on the resources of Alaska, on tobacco-culture, on the factory system, on wages paid in manufacturing industries, 3,000 copies each; of the reports on the newspapers and publishing interests, on silk manufacture, on chemical products and salt, on flour milling, on meat production, on the production of petroleum, on the manufacture of coke, on the manufacture of tobacco, on the manufacture of shop tools, 2,500 copies each; of the report on cotton-culture in the United States, including reports on cotton fiber and cotton-seed oil, 3,000 copies; of the report on cotton-culture in Louisiana, in Mississippi, in Tennessee and Kentucky, in Missouri, in Arkansas, in Texas, in Alabama, in Georgia, in North Carolina, in South Carolina, in Virginia, in California, and in the Indian Territory, 2,000 copies each: Provided, That of the above-named separate editions one-fourth shall be for the use of the Senate, one-half for the use of the House, and one-fourth for the use of the Census Office: Provided, also, That the copies of the compendium and monograph reports herein provided for the use of the Senate and House of Representatives shall be distributed directly to said Senators and Members through the folding-rooms of the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively; and those for the use of the Census Office through the document-room of the Interior Department: Provided further, That the changes or corrections necessitated by errata in former editions of the reports herein referred to shall first be made by the Superintendent of Census. And the sum of $60,000 to defray the expenses of printing and binding the publications herein provided for shall be paid out of the appropriation made by the act of August 7, 1882, entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the Tenth Census."

Mr. SCALES. I understood my friend from New York to say that this bill which he proposes provided only for the publication of 25,000 copies of the Appendix to the Census. I understand that this embraces a great many other publications.

Mr. COX, of New York. No, sir.

Mr. SCALES. Do I understand that it only embraces the Compendium of the Tenth Census?

Mr. COX, of New York. It embraces also these monographs.

Mr. SCALES. Then I must insist upon the point of order.

I stated to my friend from New York, when he came to my desk, that I should not make any objection or raise the point of order on the proposition to print 25,000 copies of the Compendium of the Census, if that was all that his proposition contemplated; and that the committee would make no objection to that. But since this proposed measure contemplates the printing of a great many other matters, which the committee have also under consideration, I must make the point of order against it.

The SPEAKER. What point of order does the gentleman make?

Mr. SCALES. I make the point of order, in the first place, that the bill now before the House, or resolution, or whatever it is, has never been introduced into this House; it has never been before the committee; it is a subject that properly belongs to the Committee on Printing and no other, and is a matter which ought to have gone there and ought to have been reported back by that committee.

Now, sir, the rule of the House that allows this privilege on the third Monday to committees certainly intends to give it to committees which have acted on matters that have been committed to them by the House. The House never by adopting that rule intended to give any committee unlimited power over any subject to bring it before the House and submit it to a two-thirds vote. It has never been so held, and I take it there can not be any two opinions in regard to it. If my friend from New York will confine himself to what I understood him to state was the object of his bill, I will withdraw the point of order; but so long as he insists on the passage of this bill containing a great deal more than I had any idea of from what the gentleman stated to me, I must insist on it.

Mr. COX, of New York. If I thought the point of order would be sustained I would modify the bill. I hope I have not misled my friend from North Carolina. I gave him all the papers in reference to it to read—I suppose he has not had time to read them—including the matters as to monographs, which are small treatises on certain subjects specified in the bill, and which are called for every day. They are taken out of the large quarto volumes of the Census. They are very cheap, being editions bound in paper and each one on one particular subject. But if the gentleman will insist on the point of order, I will strike out anything in reference to the monographs.

Many MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. COX, of New York. I would like the Speaker to decide as to the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state what he believes to be the real question involved so far as the point of order is concerned. This is a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill. But the Chair suggests to the gentleman from New York that that merely suspends the rule as to the time and manner of passing the bill. The question is whether a motion to suspend the rules and pass a particular bill must not come from the committee having jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the bill; for instance, whether the Ways and Means Committee could move to suspend the rules and pass a bill pending before the Committee on Military Affairs, or vice versa.

Mr. COX, of New York. I know it was done in previous Congresses and I thought it was a bad practice. The jurisdiction of this committee is thus stated in the resolution providing for its appointment:

Resolved, That a select committee to ascertain the result of the Tenth Census be appointed, to have the same number of members, duties, privileges, and powers as the committee of the same name had in the last Congress, &c.

Now the committee in the last Congress had the same powers as the committee in the preceding Congress; and I know when the bill was first reported here for the census we had a section as to the printing, limiting it in amount. I would not have sought to take this matter away from the Committee on Printing, except that we had more leisure time to examine into all the details, and see what had been published and what might be published. We had correspondence and petitions; and I think we have jurisdiction under certain petitions and under this resolution which I have read. But since my friend from North Carolina has misunderstood me, I will yield to him so far as to strike out all in the bill except that portion which refers to the matter connected with the compendium alone.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if this matter was referred to his committee by resolution or by bill?

The SPEAKER. That is the question involved in the point of order.

Mr. COX, of New York. I may state that I have no room as a committee-room. I generally carry the documents of my committee in my hat and take them home with me. I can not lay my hands on the papers, but I can state to the House that we have had all sorts of petitions asking for this. I do not say this bill was sent to the committee, for it was not. But we have the general subject of the census committed to us by this resolution, and have been preparing the bill in conjunction with the Census Bureau. And when you come to suspend the rules you suspend all the rules.

Mr. SCALES. But the rules are not suspended yet.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to say one word on the point of order. The bill which this bill amends was reported in the last Congress by the Committee on Printing. I have never understood that the Committee on the Census had anything to do with fixing the number of volumes or providing the manner of distributing the volumes of the census. So far as the printing is concerned, the Printing Committee always had jurisdiction on this subject, and I think should have the jurisdiction of it now. I do not think the House should take the jurisdiction of an important matter like this away from that committee.

Another thing. The members of the last Congress had 186,000 volumes of the compendium distributed. The new members of this body have not any. They have had great calls on them for these volumes, and none to send in response to those requests. I had hoped when a bill was proposed here to print an additional number of the Compendium of the Census that the new members might have a larger proportion of the number. [Applause.]

I hope this matter will be left to the Printing Committee, as it was during the last session, when I had the honor to report the bill for the printing of these volumes. That bill allowed all the volumes to be distributed by members of that Congress, so that the new members have not had any.

Mr. BUDD. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. If you do not pass this bill, how are the new members to get these volumes?

Mr. SPRINGER. If you leave the matter to the Committee on Printing, I have no doubt the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] will bring in a bill that will do justice to new members of this House.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to know if the Committee on Printing would not have the power to report this matter at any time under the rules?

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Printing is privileged to report at any time as to all printing for the use of the two Houses.

Mr. SPRINGER. It was reported as a privileged matter in the last Congress. I reported it myself.

Mr. COX, of New York. The Committee on Printing has the right to report at any time only such matters as relate to the current printing for the use of Congress; that was decided by Mr. Speaker Kerr.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The following-named committees shall have leave to report at any time on the matters herein stated, viz: * * * The Committee on Printing, on all matters referred to them of printing for the use of the House or two Houses.

The SPEAKER. Not merely current printing, but "on all matters of printing for the use of the House or two Houses."

Mr. COX, of New York. If the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] insists upon it, I will modify the resolution so as to confine it to the 25,000 copies of the compendium.

Mr. SCALES. If the gentleman will do that I will stand by the contract I made with him, and withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if this proposition should be ruled out on a point of order it would not be before the House at all; and the Committee on the Census would still have the right to present another bill.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I renew the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] insists upon the point of order, notwithstanding the proposed modification of the bill.

Mr. KASSON. If this resolution should now be referred to the Committee on Printing, would not that committee have authority to report it at any time?

The SPEAKER. The committee has jurisdiction over the subject now, and there is a bill before it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. BUDD. Pending the motion to adjourn, would a motion for a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow be in order?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. BUDD. Could the motion for a recess be now submitted and be taken up after the motion to adjourn is disposed of?

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn has precedence over a motion for a recess. The gentleman can submit the motion for a recess at the proper time.

Mr. STEELE. Would it be in order for me now to yield a half a minute to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. COX, of New York. I have never yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to yield the floor, and other gentlemen have spoken.

Mr. COX, of New York. I have never even taken my seat yet.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] spoke and then yielded the floor.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman from Illinois spoke to the point of order, and I desire to reply to him.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman has not yielded the floor, he is entitled to speak at this time.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to state that when a motion is made to suspend the rules on a general proposition, or by instructions of a committee on subjects over which that committee has jurisdiction, or even on subjects where they have no jurisdiction, it has been held that a suspension of the rules breaks down all the rules and the decision of the matter by the House is paramount.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will pardon the Chair for interrupting him, the question is whether on the third Monday of a month the Chair can recognize a committee to submit a motion to suspend the rules in relation to a subject over which the committee has no jurisdiction by an order of the House or by the rules of the House.

Mr. COX, of New York. Has the Chair decided the matter?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not announced any decision, and will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. CALKINS. Allow me to say that while I desire the passage of the bill brought forward by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], yet it seems to me that the point of order made against it must be sustained, for the reason that a committee can not report a bill or resolution which they never had jurisdiction of, which the House never referred to the committee; for a committee can not originate any proposition not referred to it.

Mr. COX, of New York. Perhaps I did not make myself understood owing to the confusion in the House. Under the rule which has been read at the Clerk's desk any individual member recognized by the Speaker can move to suspend the rules and pass any bill of any kind. There is no limitation on the individual, nor is there any more limitation on the committee. Let me read the rule:

Nor shall the Speaker entertain a motion to suspend the rules except on the first and third Mondays of each month, after the call of States and Territories shall have been completed, preference being given on the first Monday to individuals and on the third Monday to committees; and during the last six days of a session.

That is all there is of it. Therefore I ask that the Speaker shall decide that this proposition is in order, and that he will not take the matter from the great body of the House clamoring for these books.

Mr. HAMMOND. One word on the point of order. I do not oppose the passage of this bill; I think something of the kind would be right, but it ought to come from the committee having charge of the subject. Fortunately it can come in in a day or two, and then the matter can be properly submitted to the House without any violation of its rules.

It seems to me that the construction placed upon the rule by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] is altogether wrong. Suppose that the Committee on Ways and Means, when it is called, should undertake to have passed under a suspension of the rules some bill before the Committee on Military Affairs?

The SPEAKER. Or a general appropriation bill?

Mr. HAMMOND. Or a general appropriation bill?

Mr. COX, of New York. Can not an individual member do it?

Mr. HAMMOND. Such a course if allowed would lead to untold confusion. The very object of having committees is that they may report bills of which they properly have jurisdiction. The Chair is unquestionably right in the opinion he has indicated. Fortunately for us, all that is wanted of this character can be had in a very few days without violating any rule whatever.

Mr. KASSON. And determined by a majority vote.

Mr. HAMMOND. By a majority vote instead of two-thirds.

The SPEAKER. There is no difficulty, of course, in the case of an individual member moving a suspension of the rules on the first Monday of the month, because every individual member of the House has the right to introduce a bill on any subject he chooses. But it is not so with the committees of the House, for their jurisdiction and powers are defined by the rules. A committee has no right to submit any report to the House unless it relates to a subject over which it has jurisdiction by the rules of the House or by a reference of the subject to it by order of the House.

The Chair thinks it would create very great confusion in the administration of the rules and in the business of legislation if on the third Monday of the month a committee were allowed to move to suspend the rules and pass a bill relating to a subject over which the committee had no jurisdiction, and by that means take the subject away from another committee to which it properly belongs. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. KASSON. The Chair will allow me to suggest that a committee is not a committee except for a thing committed to it; as to every thing else it is a caucus, not a committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire, for the satisfaction of the House, to ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. SCALES] whether it is not the purpose of that committee to report on this subject at a very early day.

Mr. SCALES. I will say to the gentleman, as I stated in my former remarks, that the committee has already taken action upon this subject and has agreed to report a bill providing 25,000 copies of this document for gratuitous distribution by members of Congress.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wished to inquire whether that bill would not be reported at a very early day.

Mr. SCALES. It has been for several days in the hands of a member of the committee to be reported; he is authorized to report it at any time.

Mr. COX, of New York, rose.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] rose, as the Chair supposed, to take an appeal.

Mr. COX, of New York. With all respect to the Chair, I take an appeal from its decision.

Mr. WILLIS and Mr. STEELE moved that the appeal be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move that the House take a recess until to-morrow morning at half-past 11 o'clock.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] had moved to adjourn, but the Chair, desiring to give the gentleman from New York an opportunity to take an appeal, did not state the motion. The question is now on the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 93, noes 60; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 22, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented a petition of citizens of California, praying that the duty on imported raisins be advanced from 2 to 3 cents per pound; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of the Moral Education Society of Philadelphia, Pa., officially signed, praying that the power delegated by Congress to the National Board of Health may be so clearly defined that it will not legalize social vice; which was referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

He also presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pa., in favor of the passage of a bill to regulate the forms of international bills of lading; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, praying that Congress pass a law for suspending the coinage of the silver dollar until there shall be an adjustment made under which silver and gold coins shall be of interchangeable relative value; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of the Commercial Exchange of Philadelphia, Pa., favoring the passage of the Lowell bankruptcy bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of A. W. Estes Post, No. 125, Grand Army of the Republic, of Oswayo, Pa., praying that Congress comply with the recommendations of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic in relation to pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented twelve petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of Senate bill 1223, making all qualified physicians equal before the law in the Government service; which were referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. LOGAN presented the memorial of M. T. Smith, of Huron, Dak., remonstrating against the passage of the news-copyright bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Timothy O. Howe Post, No. 3, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of the Gulf, and resolutions adopted by Hess Post, No. 203, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Illinois, in favor of the recommendations of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic in regard to pensions and the equalization of bounties; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the board of supervisors of Logan County, Illinois, in favor of the passage of a bill restoring Cornelius Fitzgerald to the pension-roll; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Thomas P. Mix Post, No. 310, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Illinois, praying the passage of general legislation favorable to soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COLQUITT presented the petition of Dr. F. H. Orme and others, citizens of Atlanta, Ga., praying for the passage of Senate bill 1223, making all qualified physicians equal before the law in the Government service; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. CONGER presented the memorial of the Armington & Sims Engine Company, of Providence, R. I., remonstrating against the passage of House bill 3617 and Senate bill 1558, reducing the time for which patents for inventions are allowed to run; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. SAWYER presented the petition of H. L. Palmer and 45 other citizens of Milwaukee and Appleton, Wis., praying for the passage of Senate bill 1223, making all qualified physicians equal before the law in the Government service; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. BLAIR presented the petition of Dr. J. Lance and 49 other citizens of Campton Village, N. H., praying the passage of Senate bill 1223, making all qualified physicians equal before the law in the Government service; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARRISON. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back resolutions adopted by George W. Rader Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, in favor of granting a pension of $4 per month to all soldiers who served one year or less, and $8 per month to all who served more than one year and were honorably discharged, and protesting against the appointment of a commission of inquiry, &c., and to ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the resolutions and that they be referred to the Committee on Pensions where they properly belong.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1631) for the relief of John W. Blake, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HARRISON. I am also instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report adversely the bill (S. 651) to authorize the President to restore Charles Brewster to his former rank in the Army. This bill was once before reported adversely by the committee at this session and recommitted for an examination of some further papers. The committee again report it adversely. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2267) granting an increase of pension to Samuel C. Wright, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. I am directed by the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1464) creating a commission whose duty it shall be to inquire into and report upon the material, industrial, and intellectual progress made by the colored people of this country since 1865, and making appropriations for the same, to report it adversely. I so report the bill by direction of a majority of the committee. I ask that it be placed on the Calendar, and when it shall be reached for discussion I personally desire to support the bill, offering certain amendments to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 1798) for the relief of Edward L. Keyes; and

A bill (S. 1920) to authorize the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Dr. A. P. Frick an assistant surgeon in the United States Army.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 282) granting a pension to A. M. Wilson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1593) granting a pension to Joseph Groves, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the Committee on Patents, submitted the views of the minority of that committee on the bill (S. 638) for the relief of George Milsom, Henry Spendelow, and George V. Watson, known as the grain-shovel patent; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] on the 17th of March, "that the Secretary of the Interior be directed to report to the Senate the names of all pending applications for pensions in which the original applications have been pending for more than two years, with the condition of the same, and the reasons why the same have not been finally disposed of," to report it adversely for the reasons set forth in the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received and printed and laid upon the table, if there be no objection.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to say something further upon that general question at some time convenient to the Senate. I suppose it will be as convenient a time as any when the pension appropriation bill is up.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 990) for the relief of John D. Marrion, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COLQUITT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 670) granting an increase of pension to N. J. Ingersoll, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 286) granting the right of way through a military reservation to a railroad company, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (S. 2086) for the relief of the freedmen of the Chickasaw Nation of Indians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BAYARD introduced a bill (S. 2087) for the relief of Henry Frank; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 2088) for the relief of M. B. Pilkinton, executrix of E. T. Pilkinton, deceased, for internal-revenue stamps lost on tobacco burned in his factory; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GARLAND introduced a bill (S. 2089) for the relief of Zeb. Ward, of Little Rock, Ark.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 2090) for the relief of George Baldy; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2091) for the relief of Maj. G. W. Candee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the claim of Mrs. Susannah P. Swoope be withdrawn from the files, there having been no adverse report in regard to the claim.

PORTAGE LAKE AND LAKE SUPERIOR SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. CONGER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause an inquiry to be made on the following points, and to report to the Senate:

First. As to the amount and value of all aids and grants of any kind from the United States to the State of Michigan for the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal, or to any agent, trustee, or assignee of said State of any such aids, whether person or corporation, up to the present time, computing the value of any and all lands donated therefor by the General Government at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

Second. As to all other receipts, whether tolls, grants, privileges, or moneys received by the State of Michigan, direct or through its agents, assignees, &c., as aforesaid for and on account of construction, repair, or operating said canal up to the present time.

Third. As to all proper costs and charges for expense of construction, repairs, or operating said canal up to the present time from or by the State or its said agents, trustees, assignees, &c.; and shall report to the Senate the result of such inquiry, and shall also report from the best information obtainable upon what terms and conditions it would be just and proper for the United States to procure and take possession of said canal for the purpose of making the same a free water way for the use and benefit of navigation and commerce.

Fourth. And also to inquire and ascertain upon what terms and conditions the Portage Lake and River Improvement Company will surrender and convey to the United States, for the purpose of making the same free to the general public for navigation and commerce, all their rights, title, and interest in and to the Portage River improvement, so called, with each and all the appurtenances belonging thereto, including piers, canal cuts, embankments, &c., as well as any and all rights of way to and through Portage Lake and said Portage River and the approaches thereto; and whether such terms are reasonable and proper to enable the United States to make said water way free to the public, and such other information as may be obtained relating to the aforementioned subjects.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the resolution be printed in the usual form, that I may have copies of it.

The motion was agreed to.

PRIVILEGES OF THE FLOOR.

Mr. PLUMB. If it be in order to make the motion, I will move now that Order of Business 501, being a resolution reported from the Committee on Rules yesterday, be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not be in order without unanimous consent until the call for resolutions is completed.

Mr. PLUMB. I was under the impression that there would be no further resolutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions," that order is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under the eighth rule, pending which the Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution reported yesterday from the Committee on Rules. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XXXIII of the standing rules of the Senate be amended by inserting after the words "judges of the Court of Claims" the words "Commissioner of Agriculture," and by striking out in line 22 the word "extension."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate proceed to consider this resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend the resolution as reported by the committee by inserting the words "Commissioner of Agriculture" in the rule after "The heads of Departments."

Until the present session of the Senate the Commissioner of Agriculture was admitted to the floor of the Senate as the head of a Department. By a construction put upon the rule which is new so far as I know since I have been here, he is now excluded as not being the head of a Department, although specially named as such by the law creating the Department of Agriculture.

It is now proposed by this amend ment to the rules to put the Commissioner of Agriculture down after the private secretaries of Senators, to put him below all the persons who are entitled to admission to the floor, presumably because they have business on the floor of the Senate with Senators as such and with members of committees as such. The first in order is—

The officers of the Senate.

Next—

Members of the House of Representatives. The Sergeant-at-Arms, and the Clerk of the House.

Then—

The President of the United States, and his private secretary.

Then—

The heads of Departments.

Then—

Ministers of the United States.

Then—

Foreign ministers.

Then—

Ex-Presidents and ex-Vice-Presidents of the United States.
Ex-Senators and Senators-elect.
Judges of the Supreme Court.
Governors of States and Territories.
General of the Army.
Admiral of the Navy.
Members of national legislatures of foreign countries.
Private secretaries of Senators, duly appointed in writing; and the Librarian of Congress, and the assistant librarian in charge of the law library.
Hon. George Bancroft.
Judges of the Court of Claims.

And there it is proposed to insert "the Commissioner of Agriculture." If there is any objection to the present Commissioner of Agriculture whereby he is to be put down below the persons who come in here as a matter of courtesy, &c., let that be expressed; but I am like Paul, disposed to magnify this office. I want this officer, the head of this Department, to be admitted here because he is the head of a Department created by law, possessing important functions and increasing yearly in their importance to the people of this country. I want that recognition in the first place of him as the head of a useful branch of this Government, and I want him put in the place where he is recognized as coming upon the floor of the Senate by reason of his office and not merely as an idle courtesy which is conferred upon ex-Senators, the governors of States and Territories, the General of the Army, and those whom we wish to decorate, so to speak.

For that reason I make the motion that as the Commissioner of Agriculture is not to be considered the head of a Department he shall come in after "the heads of Departments."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves to amend the resolution, so as to insert the words "the Commissioner of Agriculture" after the words "The heads of Departments," in Rule XXXIII.

Mr. PLUMB. In a separate line, or paragraph.

Mr. MORRILL. I have a suggestion to make to the Senator from Kansas to which I think he will not object, and that is to insert after the words "the Commissioner of Agriculture" the words "the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution." It will not be very frequent, I presume, that that gentleman will be likely to want to come on the floor of the Senate, but occasionally he is required to be here. I should like very much to see him on one matter this morning if I could telephone and have him come here. I presume there will be no objection to the amendment which I suggest.

Mr. PLUMB. I am in favor of one thing at a time. There is no particular relation between these two officers. There is no reason why the head of the Smithsonian Institution should be added as an amendment to my motion. The resolution was offered by me for the accomplishment of a particular purpose. When that purpose has been accomplished, if the Senate desires to add further to the list of persons who are entitled to be admitted to the floor of the Senate for any reason, either as a matter of usefulness or as a matter of courtesy, I shall have no objection; but I do not care to have the name of any officer coupled with this officer. He is entitled to be here as the head of a Department, as he always has been here until the present session of the Senate, when by some new and I think very strained construction of the rule he has been excluded, although the language of the rule remains precisely as it has been since time immemorial.

Mr. MORRILL. I shall not embarrass the Senator, but I give notice that after the action of the Senate upon the amendment proposed by him, I shall move to further amend the rule as I have suggested.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is a very small matter indeed to occupy the attention of the Senate as to where this officer should be placed in this rule. The Committee on Rules, who certainly had no feeling of unkindness against the present incumbent and who have a high respect for him, unanimously agreed that he ought to be admitted to the floor of the Senate; but we did not see any strong reason why in naming him as among those entitled to the privileges of the floor he should be placed above the ex Presidents and Vice-Presidents of the United States, ex-Senators and Senators-elect, the judges of the Supreme Court, the governors of the States and Territories, the General of the Army, and the Admiral of the Navy; but we placed the Commissioner of Agriculture, now a very important officer, below the officers I have named. We certainly desire to have the present incumbent and all future heads of the Department of Agriculture entitled to the privileges of the floor, but we thought it would be proper to place him in a little different place in the list of those entitled to the privileges of the floor from that proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

I have no objection to putting him above the heads of Departments and above the President if that will gratify him and gratify his friends, but I do not think it is in good taste to do it. I think it would be better to put him in place according to the line of duty where by common consent the people would place his office in comparison with the importance of the Department over which he presides with great ability, and that is in the class of those below the Admiral of the Navy. If it is objected to placing him below the private secretaries of Senators, who come here not for their benefit but for our convenience, place him after the Admiral of the Navy. Still I do not propose to waste any time in debating so unimportant a point as the order of precedence in this line of officials.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Kansas complains that there has been a new construction put upon this rule. I call his attention to the fact that two years ago there was no construction put upon the rule at all; that anybody was admitted under the rule; that the retiring-rooms here were literally full of people who had no right there; that any Senator brought any friend he pleased; that no Senator could sit there five minutes without being visited by a lobbyist; that the Senate floor became a town-meeting floor; that no one on the face of the earth was excluded; and yet for the last year we have had comparative peace and comparative comfort.

Now, it is no change of the rule which has done this. The rule in words has hardly been changed at all; but one presiding officer would construe that the Commissioner of Agriculture was to be received under "the heads of Departments;" another presiding officer would rule that he was not; and finally, at the request of the Senator from Kansas, the Committee on Rules was instructed to place a construction upon the meaning of "heads of Departments." There was but one possible construction, and that was that it meant Cabinet ministers and no one else. That construction was reported to the Senate, and of course, under it the Commissioner of Agriculture was excluded, the rules now being enforced, and not hitherto having been enforced.

Then the Senator sent a resolution to the committee referring to them the propriety of admitting the Commissioner of Agriculture. Quite a number of Senators spoke to me in relation to it and desired that he should be admitted, stating that they frequently had business with him, and it would be a great convenience to Senators to have him admitted to the floor. Regarding it as undoubtedly true that it would be a convenience to Senators to have him here, the Committee on Rules inserted his name. They did not intend to reduce his dignity or his honor by placing his name where they did. Having construed "heads of Departments" to mean only Cabinet ministers, there was no obligation of course to insert him there, because he is not yet a Cabinet minister. He would not properly come next, because next come "ministers of the United States," and as the Senator from Ohio said, still below ex-Presidents and ex-Vice-Presidents, ex-Senators, Senators-elect, and judges of the Supreme Court.

So far as I am concerned, I do not care at all where the Commissioner of Agriculture is placed in this list. I do believe under the circumstances he ought to be placed here somewhere, and it is entirely immaterial to me where. If the Senate thinks that he ought to be put to the head of the list I certainly have no objection. It is a matter for the Senate to determine.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It strikes me that there is no place so proper to put the Commissioner of Agriculture as where the Senator from Kansas proposes to put him. He is the head of a Department. The Department of Agriculture is a Department of this Government, as much as is the Department of War or the Navy or anything else. We speak of it as the Agricultural Department, not as the Bureau of Agriculture. He is an officer of the Government, and he reports to the President just as the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War and the other Secretaries do. I think it is an indignity offered to the farmers of this country that the representative of more than half the people of America is excluded from the privileges of the floor of the Senate, when all the other officers of the Government are entitled to it. I see no place so appropriate as that in which the Senator from Kansas proposes to put him for admission to the floor of the Senate. I hope it will be done without any objection.
